OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brockure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

ENGLAND: AN ODE.

BY ALGERNON CHARLES SWINBURNE.

Far and near from the swan's nest here the storm-birds bred of her fair white breast,
Sons whose home was the sea-wave's foam, have borne the fame of her east and west ;
North and south has the storm-wind's mouth rung praise of England and England's quest.

Fame, wherever her flag flew, never forebore to fly with an equal wing ;
France and Spain with their warrior train bowed down before her as thrall to king ;
India knelt at her feet, and felt her sway more fruitful of than spring.

All the terror of time, where error and fear were lords of a world of slaves,
Age on age in resurgent rage and anguish darkneing as waves on waves, Fell or fled from a face that shed such grace as quickens the dust of graves.

Music made of change and conquest, glory born of evil slain,
Stilled the discord, slew the darkness, bade the lights of tempest wane, Where the deathless dawn of England rose in sign that right should reign.

Mercy, where the tiger wallowed mad and blind with blood and lust, Justice where the jackal yelped and fed, and slaves allowed it just,
Rose as England's light on Asia rose, and smote them down to dust.

Where the footfall sounds of England, where the smile of England shines,
Rings the tread and laughs the face of freedom, fair as hope divines
Days to be, more brave than ours, and lit by lordlier stars for signs.

All our past acclaims our future : Shakespeare's voice and Nelson's hand,
Milton's faith and Wordsworth's trust in this our chosen and chainless land,
Bear us witness : come the world against her, England yet shall stand.

And loud as the sea's voice thunders applause of the land that is one with the sea
Speaks Time, in the ear of the people that never at heart was not inly free,
The word of command that assures us of life, if we will but that life shall be ;

If the race that is first of the races of men who behold unshamed the sun,
Stand fast and forget not the sign that is given of the years and the wars that are done,
The token that all who are born of its blood should in heart as in blood be one.

The word of remembrance that lightens as fire from the steeps of the stormlit past
Bids only the faith of our fathers endure in us, firm as they held it fast :
That the glory which was from the first upon England alone may endure to the last.

Change darkens and lightens around her, alternate in hope and in fear to be :
Hope knows not if fear speak truth, nor fear whether hope be not blind as she :
But the sun is in heaven that beholds her immortal, and girdled with life by the sea.

THE LAST OF THE LIGHT BRIGADE.

"Twenty-four pounds represented the response, so far, of the British public to the appeal made by the Committee for funds to enable provision to be made for the declining days of those of the survivors of the Balaclava Charge who are known to have come to misery and want, and whose number now scarcely exceeds twenty.....A few shillings weekly could be granted to the necessitous survivors,.....and thereby relieve the minds of the recipients from the fear of starvation and the dread of the workhouse."—See Daily Papers.

There were thirty million English who talked of England's might,
There were twenty broken troopers who lacked a bed for the night ;
They had neither food nor money, they had neither service nor trade —
They were only shiftless soldiers—the last of the Light Brigade,

They felt that Life was fleeting ; they knew not Art was long,
Or, though they were dying of famine, they lived in deathless song.
They asked for a little money, to keep the wolf from the door ;
And the thirty million English sent twenty pounds and four.

They laid their heads together that we scarred and lined and grey Keen were the Russian sabres, but want was keener than they ;
And an old troop-sergeant muttered, " Let's go to the man who writes
The things on Balaclava the kiddies at school recites."

They went without band or colours—a regiment ten-file strong—
To look for the Master-Signer who had crowned them all in his song ;
And, waiting his servant's order, by the garden-gate they stayed—
A desolate little cluster, the last of the Light Brigade.

They strove to stand to attention, to straighten the toil-bowed back—
They drilled on an empty stomach—the loose-knit files fell slack ;
With stooping of weary shoulders, in garments tattered and frayed,
They shambled into his presence—the last of the Light Brigade.

The old troop-sergeant was spokesman, and, " Beggin' your pardon," he said,
" You wrote o' the Light Brigade, sir. Here's all that isn't dead.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

"An' it's all come true what you wrote, sir, regardin' the mouth of Hell ;
"For we're all of us nigh to the workhouse, an' we thought we'd call an' tell.

"No, thank you ; we don't want food, sir ; but couldn't you take an' write

"A sort of 'to be continued,' and 'see next page' o' th' fight ?

"We think that some one has blundered, an' couldn't you tell 'em how ?

"You wrote we were heroes once, sir. Please write, we are starving now."

The poor little army departed, limping and lean and forlorn,
And the heart of the Master-Singer grew hot with "the scorn of scorn";
And he wrote for them wondrous verses that swept the land like a flame,
Till the fatted souls of the English were scourged with the thing called Shame.

They sent a cheque to the felon that sprang from an Irish bog,
They healed the spavined cab horse ; they housed the homeless dog ;
And they sent (you may call me a liar), when rebel and beast were paid,
A cheque for—enough to live on, to the last of the Light Brigade.

O thirty million English that babble of England's might,
Behold, there are twenty heroes who lack their food to-night ;
Our children's children are lisping to "honour the charge they made,"
And we leave to the streets and the workhouse the charge of the Light Brigade.

—Rudyard Kipling, in the St. James's Gazette.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Deccan Times has opened a fund for the relief of the Last of the Light Brigade. Benevolence may be absurd and officious. But is it the genuine article, or mere advertising ?

THE Salvation War Cry recently reviewed "The Gospel According to the World. Revised and authorised edition. Edited by the Devil and published in Hell."

THE Vernacular papers of the Western Presidency are forcing themselves into unenviable prominence. They are no longer too low for notice. Prosecutions are becoming commoner. The Assistant Political Agent at Kathiawar has sued a native Bombay paper for criminal defamation in the City Magistracy of Ahmedabad. The editor was arrested on a warrant, but bailed out.

A TELEGRAM was recently wired to the Australasian Colonies announcing the fact that Mr. Vanderbilt had given £20,000 for Turner's "Canal in Venice." Thereupon, a New Zealand paper, with sense of the Fine Arts befitting the community of European adventurers in the Southern Ocean, thus comments :—"By cable we learn that Mr. Vanderbilt has brought a canal in Venice. The astute Yankee millionaire doubtless sees in the canal a source of revenue present and prospective."

WE have received some metrical trifles called "Calcutta University Melodies." We can print only one by way of sample. Apropos to the complaint in the papers, about the value of University degrees in the native marriage market, out of all proportion to their importance in the world, the following may be taken as expressing the genuine undergraduate view :—

Come o'er to me,
B. A. degree,
Mine by all means, fair or foul ;
Times may alter,
'Tis no matter,
B. A.'s are B. A.'s, by my soul.
Let fools growl, B. A.'s are society's shame,
Earn shall we rupees thirty per mensem.

Then come o'er to me,
B. A. degree,
Mine 'from Indus to the pole' ;
Times may alter,
'Tis no matter,
B. A.'s are B. A.'s, by my soul.

The piece is not unworthy of the alumni of a University which shows a wonderful instinct for selecting notorious ignoramuses, worthless intriguers and mere tuft-hunters for the honour of its Fellowship.

THE following diamond paragraph is going the round :—

"The estimated value of the total display of diamonds at the Paris Exposition was about $40,000,000. The wonder of the display was a model of the Eiffel tower, 3½ feet high, composed entirely of diamonds.
The Koh-i-noor is now out-ranked by several others. The Koh-i-noor weighs 103½ carats, but the Imperial displayed at the Exposition, weighs 180 carats, and is valued at $200,000 ; and one is still larger.
The largest in the world weighs 228½ carats, and is valued at $500,000.
The largest diamond mines in the world are the Kimberley, in South Africa. From 1871 to 1885 these mines yielded diamonds to the value of $130,000,000, weighing as precious stones three and a half tons.
To obtain them 20,000,000 tons of earth and rock were excavated.
During the past eighteen years the African mines have produced more than 40,000,000 carats or eight tons of diamonds, valued at $280,000,000."

HERE is a gold and silver calculation :—

"The quantity of gold in the world is not so large as it is commonly considered to be. There is not more than the worth of £7,000,000,000, which is about half pure gold and half silver. The annual production is about £100,000,000 worth, and the production has decreased 44 per cent. during the last thirty years. The production of silver, however, has increased 100 per cent., and now equals that of gold. One-third of the gold goes to wear and tear, one-third goes into circulation, and one-third into the arts and manufactures. All the gold in the world would make a pile only 25 feet wide, 45 feet long, and 25 feet high."

It is one of the mysteries of poor human nature, how the most struggling of us feel a vague and not unpleasurable interest in reading these bewildering details of fabulous wealth. The figures ought to humble the richest.

HERE, from an unexpected quarter, is the genesis of the diversity of the human race from original unity :—

"The Seminole Indians have a singular tradition regarding the white man's origin and superiority. They say when the Great Spirit made the earth he also created three men, all of whom were fair-complexioned. He then led them to a small lake and bade them jump in.
One immediately obeyed the command and came out purer and fairer than before ; the second hesitated awhile, by which time the water became muddled, and when he came up he was copper-colored ; the third did not leap until the water became black with mud, and he came out with his own color. After this the Great Spirit laid before them three sealed packages, and gave the black man the first choice, so that he might have a chance to amend his former misfortune. He closely examined each package, and having felt their weight, chose the heaviest in preference to the rest believing it to be the best and most valuable. The copper-colored man chose the next heaviest, leaving the white man the lightest. When the packages were opened the first contained spades, hoes and other implements of labor ; and the second unfolded fishing tackle, and hunting and warlike weapons ; the third gave the white man pens, ink and paper—the means of mental improvement, social ink of humanity, the foundation of the white man's superiority."—Christian Gleaner.

That is a charming explanation at once poetical and instructive. It is certainly better than the explanation of many phenomena given in the religious records of many of the proudest races.

UNDER the eye of the Political Agent at Cambay, the enquiry into the attempted murder of Mr. Shamrao Narayan Laud, the Nawab's Dewan, has been concluded. One of the persons implicated is Ruttonchand, a mehta in the employ of the Nawab's brother. An application was made to get him out on bail on the ground of a marriage about to take place in his family, but refused by the Nawab. This man with two others were committed to the Sessions. One of them has been acquitted and two sentenced to seven years' imprisonment each.

THE Mahajans of Bhownugger met last week at the Mahajan Dhurma-sala, under the presidency of Nugger Sett Bhagwanbhai, and passed resolutions expressive of great sympathy with the Maharaja Saheb "for the undeserved annoyance caused to him of late by foul and mendacious aspersions cast on him by ungrateful persons," of confidence in the present form of government by the Council, against which the attacks were aimed, and of sorrow at the collapse of the Brahmachari commission which, in consequence, did not allow the witnesses to depose to their

"loyal and grateful feelings towards their popular ruler." The meeting was unanimous in showing "its unqualified abhorrence and contempt for the foul attacks made on His Highness and his present advisers." The utmost enthusiasm of loyalty prevailed among the assembled bankers and merchants.

KAISER Wilhelm is laying himself out for popularity. Lately, he attended a dinner on board the Fulda where he spoke thus:—

"I thank you, and express my pleasure that I am enabled to make myself acquainted with the work and objects of the North German Lloyd. Every success of the Company fills me with pride, for its ships, which go to all points of the compass from the great emporium, are the subject not only of our own, but also of foreign admiration, examples of the efficiency of the builders of the merchant navy, and able to show themselves everywhere without misgiving. Of course, my efforts are directed to the maintenance of peace. Commerce and trade can flourish only when the safe conduct of business is guaranteed by peace. As a friend of maritime affairs, I follow the phenomena of Nature. When I sailed the Baltic with a squadron for the first time the question of a change of course arose. The change was made, but the ships were separated in the fog in consequence. Suddenly the German flag emerged from the mist high above the clouds—a surprising sight, which filled all of us with admiration. Later, the whole squadron, accurately steering its new course, emerged after the fog had blown off. This seemed to me a sign. Whatever dark hours may come to our Fatherland, we shall reach our goal by dint of pushing forward, according to the grand watchword, 'We Germans fear God, and nothing else in this world.' If, in the Press and in public life, symptoms of danger appear, one must console oneself with the thought that matters are not nearly so bad as they seem. Trust in me to preserve peace, and if the Press sometimes interprets my remarks differently, think of the old saying of another Emperor, 'An Emperor's words are not to be turned and twisted and quibbled over.' I ask all present to join me in cheers for Lloyd's continued progress and prosperity."

The Empire is Peace and good will to all men.

It is not likely that the Delhi-Kotri scheme will be approved by Government. Mr. Croudace has completed the survey, and estimates the cost at four millions sterling, or about £6,000 a mile.

THE North-Western Railway is in for a considerable reduction in the establishment, specially in the Traffic and Local Departments. The immediate cause is given out to be the slackness of traffic, on account of small crop. That cause is temporary, but the men will be thrown out permanently.

IN July, last year, a passenger boat sank while crossing the ferry on the Indus at Attock, at one of the most dangerous spots where the river is narrow and the rush of water great. Some of the boatmen, at the risk of their own lives, rescued 31 of the passengers. These boatmen have now been awarded Rs. 120. Rather too niggardly a reward for imperilling even water-men's lives.

THE Madras Railway Company have agreed to admit passed students from the Madras College of Engineering to the Perambore Workshops, for a course of practical instruction in mechanical engineering, for two years, on a premium of Rs. 500. Government will bear each year half the cost of the best student passed by the College. Students desirous of learning mechanical engineering will be trained free at the Public Works Workshops.

SIXTEEN municipalities in the Belgaum district and two in Surat have been disfranchised. The Governor declares the municipal Acts unsuitable to these municipalities, for want of interest on the part of the inhabitants in municipal administration. Government has taken upon itself the nomination of Commissioners. But will that improve matters? If the so called townships are supremely rural, it is too early to force municipalities on them. The original mistake lies there, we are afraid.

THE Port Commissioners have obtained permission of the Lieutenant-Governor to expend Rs. 15,653, for certain improvements at the Petroleum Dépôt at Budge-Budge.

FOR raising the embankment and rails between 116th and 121½ miles on the Eastern Section of the Eastern Bengal State Railway, about 100 bigahs of land, in the villages of Khoord Durgapur, Sherkandee, Batkamara, Duree Batkamara, Buhonoor Mohubutpur, Mysokala, Sudkee Mohomudpur, Nischindabaree and Sumuspur, pergunnahs Berahimpur, Jangirabad and Sudkee, zilla Nuddea, have been declared under the Act (X of 1870.)

FOR improvement of the drainage of a portion of the Serampore municipality, the Government is willing to advance a loan of Rs. 30,000, repayable in 20 years with interest at 4½ per cent, or Rs. 2,306-4-8 on the first of every year commencing from 1891, till it has paid off Rs. 46,125-13-4. The advance will be made, unless good reasons are shown to the contrary within one month. Recently, the municipality was condemned as very unhealthy. The native Chairman explained, complained of funds and resigned. A European now guides the deliberations of the Commissioners, and the Government is prepared to assist them in the sanitary improvement of the town. In due course, it will go down to posterity how the natives were content to wallow in dirt until a white man came to the rescue and converted the old Danish town—the scene of the labours of Carey, Marshman and Ward, and of Mack, Marshman, Townsend, Smith, Routledge, Jennings, and Hooley—into a healthy and savoury place.

IT is announced that Mr. Bradlaugh has determined to enter the Theosophical Society. India is slowly getting into the head of the great Secularist.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE blustering Boulanger has been played out. He has made up his mind for retirement to private life. Not a day too soon. There is no more chance for an opening for him. France is tired of him. His countrymen's passion is for meteorological politics. No Fabius for them! They cannot endure a rebel who is not always ready to risk his neck.

THEY have managed the Cleveland-street scandal in their usual neat way and hanged—metaphorically—their understrapper, thus preserving at once their virtue and their connections. The righteous indignation of England has been appeased by the conviction of Solicitor Newton, on a minor charge to which he pleaded guilty. He has been acquitted on five counts and sentenced on the sixth to six weeks' imprisonment. The big scapegraces were sent out of harm's way betimes.

THE Brussels miners have, at a Conference in Jolimont, declared for the eight hours' movement.

In the Indian Civil Service examinations, it is probable that science will be better recognized by additional marks.

Sir James Fergusson has denied in the House of Commons in the Committee of Supply that England was making sacrifices to Germany in East Africa. Negotiations between the two Powers are proceeding amicably, and England's rights and interests will be maintained. Her Britannic Majesty's Government has, of course, protested—proudly and persistently—to—Portugal against foreign interference in the British settlements in Nyassaland and Shiré region.

At the Merchant Taylors' banquet on the 22nd, the Premier took up the parable with energy. Lord Salisbury contradicted the insinuations of Mr. Stanley that the British Government had ceded to Germany large tracts of country in Africa. His Lordship further denied that any agreement was concluded between the two countries or that there was any possibility of one. Elsewhere he declared that the Zambesi and Shiré rivers were international highways, and that there was no question of negotiating with Portugal as regards the stoppage of vessels.

A Portuguese scientific expedition will start for Mozambique in July next. The British Government has already ordered the despatch there of two gun-boats of light draught.

The German East African Company worked last year at a loss of eighteen thousand pounds.

THERE is a Russian difficulty for Turkey which may lead to grave results. It is reported that five Turkish officers at Constantinople committed indecent assault on the wife and daughter of M. Ivanoff, Chief Dragoman to the Russian Embassy. Whilst they were out on a walk at Buyukdere, they were seized and kissed. Some Russian sailors went to their rescue and secured four of the assailants who are now lodged in the Embassy. The Ambassador, M. Nelidoff, refuses to make over the men to Turkish authorities, he having no faith in Turkish justice. The same Ambassador immediately before had firmly demanded of the Porte the payment still due of the last war indemnity out of the new loan, and threatened, in the event of refusal, to follow up with adequate measures for recovering the same. The impetuous State may be compelled to yield its rights in the other matter in exchange for grace to pay its dues.

IN maintenance of Armed Peace, the German army is to be reorganised with an addition of fifty-three thousand men over and above the eighteen thousand already provided for. Under orders of the British Admiralty, the torpedo depôt ship Hecla is to be transformed into a cable ship, to accompany squadrons during manœuvres, and during war as a means of communication with home. She will be made to carry two thousand miles of cable on board.

In the House of Lords, at the instance of Lord Wemyss, there was a debate on Socialism. Lord Salisbury remarked that it was a great mistake and implied the State taking upon itself the duties of an individual. Yet the agitation indicated existence of evils which Government could not well afford to ignore.

On the 19th, the Prince of Wales, in the presence of the Duke of Cambridge, Mr. Stanhope and Lord Wolseley, unveiled the Royal Engineers' memorial statue of General Gordon at the School of Military Engineering at Chatham.

THE latest report of the Congress agitation in England is

"The delegates were entertained on the 19th by the Manchester Reform Club at a banquet. Mr. Jacob Bright, who presided, said that he thought the claims of the Congress moderate, and that it was desirable that they should be conceded. Mr. Mudholkar described in detail why India needed representation, and quoted Mr. Maclean in support of his argument. Mr. Banerjee, in replying to Mr. Goschen's recent charge that the Indian reformers were in correspondence with the Irish American League, declared the assertion to be absolutely baseless. Only one Indian, he said, had been known to correspond with the Fenians, and he was an anti-Congress-wallah, and was recently quoted in the Times as such. Sir W. Wedderburn also spoke, and all the speakers gratefully referred to the late Mr. John Bright's services to India."

WE summarise the following items from the news by the latest Australian mail :—

The committee of the London Mineral exhibition think it only right that they should make special reference to the splendid collection of minerals sent by New South Wales, which has been quite a feature of the exhibition.

CHARLES CALDERHOOD, Rose Calderhood, and Daniel Coughlin, are under trial for conspiring to defraud the Australian Widows' Insurance Company of £1,000.

MR. Cosmo Newbery, after examination of the ore, is unable to give a decided opinion regarding the alleged discovery of platinum near Colac.

THE anti-Christians and infidels have got a grievance. ON April 18, a contingent of the party of Freethought, as they love to call themselves, with a camp following of members of Parliament and others, besieged Postmaster-General Powers on the refusal to transmit free through the post as a newspaper, the freethought organ, the Stockwhip. Mr. Powers was not to be bullied however. He made vigorous reply, exposing the pretensions of the Stockwhip to rank as a newspaper. It was not even registered as such. Finally, he showed the mischievousness of its contents, giving point to his remark by reading extracts from it. He had no hesitation in thinking that in the interest of the majority of the people that paper should not be sent through the post at the public expense.

THE tanners and curriers at Hindmarsh on strike in furtherance of the eight hours' principle, had made an offer of a concession, but the masters declined to accept it, insisting on the Victorian system, but paying flushers 50s. instead of 45s. The masters are obliged to take up that position on the ground of severe competition with the manufacturers in Victoria and New South Wales, and other handicaps by the South Australian tanners.

The Electric Light Commission have recommended the incandescent circuit for Parliament House and the railway station.

THE Australian Federal Council having, on the 10th February, recommended an increase in the number of representatives for each Colony on the said Council, according to population, the Legislatures of several of the Colonies adopted addresses to the Queen praying for an Order in Council granting the proposed increase. The Attorney-General of Tasmania, however, doubted whether an Order in Council could issue. The Secretary of State consulted the law officers of the Crown, and they without being able to give a decisive opinion, were of the same mind. Under the circumstances, Her Majesty could not accede to the prayer. At any rate, all the Legislatures concerned must send in a request before even an order for specific increase (that is, irrespective of the numbers of population) could be made. A letter to this effect from Lord Knutsford to the Governor of Tasmania has just appeared in the Colony. Similar answers have doubtless been sent to the addresses from other Colonies.

THE question of the appointment of an Englishman as Tutor to the young Scindhia against the dying request, duly accepted, of his father the late ruler of Gwalior, has been raised in Parliament. There never was a more shocking piece of business transacted even in the Foreign Office. The financial aspect of this high-handed arrangement is of a piece with its general character. Here it is, put in stubborn arithmetical array; one may run and see :—

"The late Scindhia's arrangement cost the State Rs. 4,000 nearly as under :—

	Monthly. Rs.	Yearly. Rs.
Pandit Ramkissen.....	200
" Anandi Lall.....	125

Total...325 × 12 = 3,900

Then Sir Lepel Griffin introduced a new scale by which the cost was raised to Rs. 15,000 yearly :—

Pandit Dharam Narayan.....	1,000
" Pran Kissen.....	250

Total...1,250 × 12 = 15,000

The Present arrangement introduced by the Government of India more than doubles the cost :—

Mr. Johnstone.....	1,500
Pandit Dharam Narayan.....	1,000
" Prankissen.....	200
Principal, Maharaja's College.....	250

Total...2,950 × 12 = 35,400 "

Thus bravely goes on the exploitation of the Native States under British auspices.

KHUSHAL CHAND, a wealthy jeweller of Indore, slipped out of the State to defeat his creditors. Travelling with a prodigious retinue and baggage, he was arrested, on suspicion, by the Opium Inspector at Khandwa who, receiving no satisfactory explanation from the man, informed the Indore Durbar, and sent his jewel boxes back to Indore under police guard. One of the creditors of Khushal Chand now filed a suit in the Indore Court for the recovery of his dues amounting to half a lac of Rupees. He was advised to prosecute Khushal Chand criminally under section 206, I. P. C. The Chief Justice of Indore, on affidavits filed before him, ordered the Magistrate to try Khushal Chand. The Dewan of Indore, however, stepped in and quashed the order and prevented the prosecution. Of course, there is a great outcry against the administration, specially from the enemies of Khushal Chand, and their lawyers. The courts of Indore are declared to be a farce, the Dewan has himself superseded them, and the Maharaja is said to be at the bottom of all. We are not prepared to endorse the view. As yet, we have the ex parte account, but the circumstances have a bad look.

THERE is some chance of some justice from the public to the Holkar. Hitherto the case has gone ex parte, His Highness, ignorant of the power of repetition to damage any reputation however exalted or well fortified, having disdained to vindicate himself through his friends. But a champion has at last started up. One J. A. Manuel, who describes himself as "Late Pleader High Court, Calcutta," is persistently attacking the public ear through the columns of the Eastern Herald, in favour of Maharaja Sivaji Rao. For, if we mistake not, we remember reading Mr. Manuel's present communication in the same journal before. The revival thereof shows determination. In a long rambling and confused letter, Mr. Mannel points to Sir Kashi Rao Holkar, uncle of the ruling Holkar Bahadoor, and his factotum Martand Rao, as the root of all mischief and cause of all the differences in the Maharaja's family and of all his bad name, and denounces them as intriguers of the first water and almost rebels. We dare say they will have something to say to these heavy charges. Or the Residency will compel them to notice them. The public can only gain by an obstinate campaign without quarter between the parties.

Rai Bahadr Jai Prokash Lal, Dewan of the Maharaja of Dumraon, late member of the Bengal Legislative Council, Honorary Magistrate and President of the Independent Bench at Dumraon, in the district of Shahabad, has, at length, with tardy liberality, been vested with the powers of a Magistrate of the second class. In an independent raj, he would have ruled the Courts, both civil and criminal, and Dumraon with a clear income of ten lacs a year is materially more important than many a minor political chiefship.

BABOO Janaki Ballav Sen, Zemindar of Dimla, in the district of Rungpore, a far more respectable person, by the way, than his fellows who have won titles—has subscribed Rs. 20,000 in aid of the drainage scheme for Rungpore, and another Rs. 20,000 for a building to be named the Janaki Ballav House, to be attached to the native sanitarium at Darjeeling, for the exclusive accommodation of Hindu patients. Rungpore—thanks to Dr. K. D. Ghose, and other sanitary reformers—is now a decently healthy town, but a good supply of water is still a crying want, and we are glad to see the landlords of the District so alive on the subject. We congratulate the good Commissioner, Mr. Lewis, on the success which is attending his zealous efforts in behalf of the native sanitarium at Darjeeling, which we owe to him and to the devotion to the cause of his Personal Assistant Baboo Hari Mohun Chandra. Of course, the zeal would have come to nought, unless the Maharaja of Cooch Behar had come forward to grant the ground, or Baboo Gobind Lal Roy had, in view of title, placed the magnificent sum of Rs. 80,000 at the disposal of the Commissioner. And now the liberality of Baboo Janaki Ballav Sen has substantially enhanced the usefulness and dignity of the new Native Sanitarium by a splendid gift. All honour to him.

HINDUISM is far from defunct, even in go-a-head Bombay. It is like the Sick Man of European politics—always dying, by account of the enemy, but never allowing them the full satisfaction of burying him and dividing his estate. Caste though, as befits a conservative, slow in its operations, is pretty sure in its vengeance. Thus, in January last at Bombay, there was a dinner at Dr. Atmaram Pandurang's house, attended by Hindoos of different castes. There were also a European lady, Dr. Emma Brainerd Ryder, and the well-known Pandita Ramabai who, after her unfortunate attachment for a Bengali Shao and a brief stay in Brahmoism, has found a refuge for body and soul in the bosom of the Church and the Christian community. It is now announced that Hindu society has called the defiant transgressors of the Hindu scheme of purity to account, and they are understood to be, one by one, clearing themselves by eating the very humble and far from savoury or odoriferous pie prescribed for such offenders. They are required to perform prayaschit and renew the ceremony of regeneration for the twice-born and take to the symbolic sacred thread anew. Among those involved, the Rast Gofar names Mr. Nursingrao Bholanath, Civil Servant at Sholapore, and his brother, and Ramanbhai, son of Mr. Mahipatram Rupram. Mr. Ramanbhai at any rate will be able to partake with a good face of the sanctifying refreshments, which are no new delicacies in his family.

THE Calcutta University could not bungle and bungle and not make known the results of the examinations for ever. To-day it publishes the Entrance results, namely, 347 in the first, 1185 in the second and 1106 in the third division. The First Arts is not yet.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Old Wounds, Sores and Ulcers.—Daily experience confirms the fact which has triumphed over all opposition for more than forty years, viz., that no means are known equal to Holloway's remedies for curing bad legs, bad breasts, sores, wounds, diseases of the skin, erysipelas, abscesses, burns, scalds, and, in truth, all maladies where the skin is broken. To cure these infirmities quickly is of primary importance, as compulsory confinement indoors weakens the general health. The ready means of cure are found in Holloway's Ointment and Pills, which heal the sores and expel their cause. In the very worst cases the Ointment has succeeded in effecting a perfect cure after every other means had failed in giving adequate relief.

OF the four engines working at the Tallah water station, through which the whole supply for the town passes, one has suddenly been found out of order and needing repairs. That means restricted supply of water, but the Engineer to the Corporation thinks that the remaining three are able to give the present daily supply equally distributed over the 24 hours. In the absence of the fourth pump, the water, however, cannot be raised to the required height. It will be necessary therefore for the inhabitants to economize the supply. Much water is usually allowed to waste, through the carelessness of servants and want of supervision of owners of houses. That must be checked. Indeed, house-owners themselves are inviting measures which cannot be palatable to them. If they mean to avoid forced restriction, their conduct at this or similar occasions will hasten or postpone the evil day.

THE Bengal Secretariat press establishment are far from a happy and contented body. For a long time past, there appears to have prevailed amongst them a spirit of deep rankling discontent with the management of Mr. Lewis, accompanied at times with a spirit of resistance to his authority. A number of the compositors, smarting under real or supposed injuries, seem to have at last hit upon the usual device of such like folk of addressing anonymous complaints to the Government, and setting up a newspaper agitation against Mr. Lewis's treatment of his hands. For these indiscretions, a dozen of them have been dismissed after an enquiry held by Mr. Secretary Cotton. One of these is not satisfied with the finding of Mr. Cotton, and has appealed to the Government of India. We do not know what the chances of an appeal from such a poor person against a Local Government are, but it is pitiable that there should arise any cause for such a state of disorder in a Secretariat department.

THE INDIGO CRISIS IN JESSORE.

It seems time enough the Government of Bengal should allay the public feeling on the subject of the long continued indigo disputes in Jhenida and Magura, by publishing its own statement on the subject. We have refrained so far from noticing the subject, although we have not ceased in our private efforts towards pacification of the difficulty. But there appears to be no indication of an approaching settlement. The facts of the subject have indeed been considerably obscured by misrepresentation on both sides. Even the correspondent specially deputed by the Statesman to the spot, is unable to make any better case for the planters than to harp on the fact that Mr. Sheriff keeps schools for the education of the tenantry. But often school-starting, with natives as with Europeans, is a dodge of charity to cover a multitude of sins, or to gain selfish, sordid ends. We have really been not a little amused by reading some of the despatches of this writer. Evidently, Mr. Sheriff's hospitality has proved too much for faithful discharge of duty, but no sensible man will be favourably impressed for his clients by his playing on the one string of the so-called planter educational philanthropy. It is the old story—the plea of collateral advantages of Indigo manufacture finally urged at the famous Indigo Commission of Sir John Peter Grant, to save the then doomed industry. Our contemporary, however, has made amends for the one-sided statements of his special correspondent, by freely throwing open his columns to writers on the other side. One of these writers, not exactly on the other side, is Babu Dharendra Nath Pal, the pet of Anglo-India. He has written some clever letters on the subject which we have read with great interest. In fact, his letters are up to this time the best unofficial presentment of the subject. Babu D. N. Pal is an indigo-planter himself and a Zemindar, and his leanings are not likely to be overmuch towards the rayyets. Yet, he seems to have succeeded in producing on the whole a fair and impartial statement of the case. He does not spare the rayyets where they are in his view in fault, nor their "advocates." But at the same time, he lays thick on the other side. He shows conclusively that, in spite of the material benefits accruing to the district from the presence of the indigo business, the business itself is propped up by zoolm. There is a great degree of personal violence and oppression committed by the planters or by their myrmidons. For the rest, Mr. Luson would appear to be about the worst man the Government could select for the delicate task of evolving harmony from the complications and disorders that are prevailing in the districts. Babu Pal gives a vivid account of almost military raid by Mr. Luson in a market, which ought to have at once led to his removal from his duty. No doubt, the Government is closely watching his conduct, and we expect to see it every day rise to the height of the situation. Perhaps the light of Parliamentary agitation will quicken its conscience. People have been sent to jail in batches, and quite a reign of terror instituted. In the market scene, Mr. Luson headed almost a regiment of quasi military force, and fire arms were freely opened indiscriminately upon those assembled there for buying and selling, without the least compunction. All this, however, seems to have failed of its object of cowing down the peasantry. No signs of the restoration of order are visible, nor does the Government give any hint to show that it is alive to the gravity of the situation. On the contrary, its sufferance of Mr. Luson's extraordinarily wild proceedings is far from being of a reassuring character.

Another correspondent of the Statesman, P. N. M., shows, by facts and figures, that indigo cultivation is anything but profitable to the tenants. Indeed, the chronic tyranny of indigo planters over their rayyets, both in past and present times, lends some colour to this view. At any rate, the rayyets seem to be allowed very little margin for profit by the grasping avarice of their European employers. This is more or less the case in all relations between Capital and Labor, and is at the root of the strained state of feelings between them. How far this is the case in regard to indigo cultivation, and whether or not it is forced on an unwilling peasantry by a system of force overtly or covertly countenanced by officers of Mr. Luson's type, are fair questions for the decision of another Indigo-Commission. Anyhow, the silence of the Government, while things are drifting to an anarchy, is sure to be interpreted into support of the cause of the industry and the abnormal conditions on which it is maintained.

The attitude of the Government has led friends of the aggrieved party to carry the matter to the House of Commons.

On Monday, the 28th April, Mr. Bradlaugh was to have put the following questions in the House, to wit :

"To ask the Under-Secretary of State for India, whether the Secretary of State is aware that grave disaffection exists in Jessore, Bengal, in consequence of the action of Mr. Luson, a member of the Civil Service, towards certain rayyets in indigo cultivation tracts :

Whether certain Hindoo magistrates have been removed from the subdivisions of Jhenidah and Magurah, Jessore district, to other subdivisions, at the instance of the indigo planters of the district :

Whether Mr. Luson was appointed to take charge of these subdivisions :

Whether such an arrangement is in accordance with the practice in Indian administration :

Whether he is aware that Mr. Luson was formerly in charge of the neighbouring sub-division of Meherpore, and, while so in charge, ordered fifty villagers to be whipped for fishing, which conduct was characterised by Sir Comer Petheram, the Chief Justice of the High Court of Calcutta, as violent and illegal :

Whether the rayyets of the sub-divisions of Jhenidah and Magurah have addressed a petition to Mr. Luson alleging various illegalities and oppressive conduct in his magisterial capacity :

Whether Mr. Luson, for alleged misdemeanors in reference to indigo cultivation, summarily tried, is now sending cultivators to gaol in batches, and imposing heavy fines :

And, whether, if these circumstances have not been brought to his notice, the Secretary of State will, without delay, inquire into the facts.

That question was duly asked, and answered by Sir John Gorst with ministerial evasion, as follows :—

"The Secretary of State has no ground for supposing that grave disaffection exists in Jessore district, but he is aware that certain Native newspapers have made statements similar to those indicated in the question. The Secretary of State has no official information on the points raised except as to the conviction of villagers by Mr. Luson for illegal fishing. The convictions were quashed, but the Secretary of State is not aware that the Chief Justice stated Mr. Luson's conduct to be violent and illegal. The Secretary of State has no reason to interfere with the vigilance which the local Government always exercises in matters between indigo planters and rayyets.

Mr. Bradlaugh : May I ask the right hon. gentleman if he is aware from the newspaper reports that such facts are alleged, and if they are not sufficiently grave to require an answer ?

Sir J. Gorst : The Secretary of State is not in the habit of addressing inquiries to the Local Government of India in regard to statements in the local newspapers. If the hon. member will make a proper complaint no doubt it will be made the subject of a report to the Secretary of State."

We are now informed that—

"Mr. Bradlaugh gave notice that on the 15th May he will present a petition from the Jessore indigo rayyets respecting the urgent necessity of transferring Mr. Luson from the indigo sub-divisions, and holding an immediate enquiry into their grievances. Sir John Gorst having refused enquiry Mr. Bradlaugh asks the House to discuss the subject-matter of the petition forthwith."

The petition of the rayyets referred to is in the following terms :—

The Honourable the Commons of Great Britain and Ireland in Parliament assembled :—

The humble petition of the undersigned inhabitants of the villages situated in the District of Jessore in the Presidency of Bengal ;

Respectfully Sheweth :—

1. That your humble petitioners are the cultivating rayyets of the European Indigo planters of the Bijulia concern in the Sub-division of Jhenidah in the district of Jessore.

2. That they have been for years oppressed in various ways and forced to cultivate indigo against their will by the said planters.

3. That failing to obtain justice in the ordinary Courts of law they submitted petitions to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, the Commissioner of the Presidency Division, and the District Magistrate of Jessore praying for the redress of their grievances in September 1889.

4. That the then District Magistrate of Jessore held an enquiry into the subject matter of their said petitions in the middle of October 1889, and found that the allegations against the planters were substantially true and reported accordingly to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal.

5. That after the said District Magistrate had submitted his report and the rayyets refused to cultivate indigo against their will, the indigo planters began to harass your humble petitioners by instituting a large number of vexatious civil and criminal suits against them, with the object of binding your humble petitioners to their will.

6. That, in the meantime, the Government of Bengal transferred the then Sub-Divisional Officer of Jhenidah, a Hindoo, to another place, although there was no allegation of bias and partiality against him by the planters, and placed Mr. Hewling Luson, C.S., in charge of Jhenidah, as well as Magurah, the adjoining sub-division, where too the rayyets had petitioned the local Government and refused to cultivate indigo.

7. That the said Mr. Luson was only about three years ago severely censured by the Calcutta High Court for having "brought the administration of justice into contempt," to use the language of the Chief Justice, in connection with the Meherpore fishing case, in which he had caused about fifty rayyets to be illegally whipped for no other offence than that of fishing in a lake.

8. That Mr. Luson took charge of Jhenidah on the 7th January last, and from that day up to the 9th April, he has convicted 153 persons, of whom 123 have been fined Rs. 1,097, 30 sentenced to various terms of imprisonment, whereas his predecessor on title had occasion to convict six men only in the course of four months from among the indigo rayyets.

9. That there are still criminal cases pending against 348 persons before Mr. Luson and the police officers under him.

10. That Mr. Luson is openly siding with the planters and punishing the rayyets with the object of coercing them into indigo cultivation.

11. That of the adult male population of about two thousand men, about 1,400 persons have been sued against by the planters, 900 in the Civil and 500 in the Criminal Courts.

12. That if Mr. Luson brought the justice into contempt while at Meherpore, he has brought it into greater contempt here at Magurah and Jhenidah, where the rayyets charge him to his face with being partial, and where he is being petitioned by them not to try their cases on the ground of his being biased in favour of the planters who are his countrymen and with whom he is on friendly and intimate terms.

13. That your humble petitioners have submitted several petitions to the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, but have received no redress of their grievances, nor even replies to their petitions.

Your humble petitioners, therefore, pray that the Government in India be directed to appoint a Commission of Inquiry to enquire into their grievances and to transfer Mr. Luson from the Sub-divisions of Jhenidah and Magurah."

The petition embodies the extraordinary state of things that has been prevailing under Mr. Luson's reign of terror all these weary months. If the appeal to Parliament has even the effect of inspiring the Government here with a due sense of the nature of the crisis, which its own indifference in regard to these indigo disputes has precipitated, it shall not have been made in vain.

THE DEAD AND THE LIVING.

WE do not look into the Hindoo Patriot or the Indian Mirror, though we thereby lose a treat. There is always something or other in them. And the latter is positively amusing. For that matter, to give the clown his due, we confess the former is running close on the other's heels. Opening the last issue of the Hindoo Patriot we find the editor writing, or at least publishing, on the 19th May, as follows :—

"Great preparations are being made in Europe and America for the labour demonstration on the 1st of May. The outlook is serious in Austria, where the labour agitation is intense. Everywhere in Austria the cry is raised for higher wages and shorter hours. Military precautions make Vienna like a city preparing for a siege. M. Zola, the novelist, believes that whether by pacific or violent means the present social state of the world is about to disappear. He regards the May day demonstrations as a premonitory sign of the universal crisis. The realistic instincts of M. Zola see evils which do not affect the social order one way or another."

That is the whole paragraph and all that our contemporary has on the subject. There is not a word about America after the opening sentence, unless Austria may be taken for an American country. Certainly, Zola is either Austrian or American—or the paragraph is an incoherent strain. But what on earth has the "realistic instincts" of the notorious novelist got to do in the business, is what "no fellah can understand."

Turning to the Indian matter, we are arrested by an obituary notice. The same paper records with sorrow the death of Baboo Deno Nath Mallik. This is the expression of the true milk-of—assinine kindness. The very relations who as in duty bound visit the sons of the deceased, make no secret of congratulating them on their emancipation from the truculent yoke of an imperious, self-willed, abnormally conceited, utterly inconsiderate parent. Does this Proser Laureate to Calcutta Baboodom know that when the sister of Denonath, living with another brother, on receiving the news of death, attempted a feeble demonstration of grief in the customary way, she was stopped instantly by the other lady relatives and rebuked for wasting breath on such an object? And the Hindoo Patriot forsooth is sorry! Has the writer—we cannot say editor, for the paper has scarcely any editor—lost his appetite?

The whole is couched in the same vein of unreality. The notice is so rich that we quote it entire.

"His wealth and his culture commanded respect from all classes of the people. He was passionately fond of metaphysical study, and was a firm believer in the truths of Hinduism. He was of a quiet disposition, but he felt deeply, and where occasion required it, he boldly spoke out his sentiments. He was for many years a member of the Managing Committee of the British Indian Association and though he never took an active part in public movements, he evinced a deep interest in the political welfare of his countrymen."

His wealth may be admitted, though he was vain of it out of all proportion. But it was by no means stunning. Many obscure widows in town may be found to possess as much or more. He owned only a fourth of the estate of the Pataldanga Malliks. Yet he was wont to compare himself with "Jotindro"—as he used to call the Maharaja—a preposterous pretension. The respected head of the Tagore family is not perfection, but to use one of Macaulay's striking comparisons, the difference between the soaring angel and the creeping snake is a type of the difference between the accomplished Sir J. Tagore and the unspeakable Baboo Mallik just gone to his final rest. It is an insult to the country to say that the wealth of this braggart miser commanded the respect of all classes. What! have our countrymen declined so far that the mere possession of wealth, unaccompanied by the capacity to employ it to any purpose, constitutes a claim on their respect? Great as is our degeneracy, we hope our people cannot feel aught but contempt for an intellectual and moral eunuch who brandishes at them a tightly gripped and carefully strung purse. Whatever the degradation reached by many individuals, the nation is still free from this grovelling fetishism. His culture was an unknown quantity—an unsuspected possession. We can positively assert that he could not tell the meaning of the word. We really doubt whether this eulogist knows it. His hero certainly knew the alphabet, and indeed was versed in all knowledge short of the grammar. And to talk of metaphysics because he lent himself to charlatans who showed him ghosts! and of his firm faith in the truths of Hinduism because he sacrificed his life in a weak adhesion to another charlatan who pretended to teach him Yoga! why this is worthy of George Robins! As for his connection with the British Indian Association, he would not pay unless they put him on the Committee, and he paid for the bagatelle because, like a genuine snob, he thought the connection gave him status. But did he ever take part in any subject? He did not pretend to understand any public question, wisest of mankind as he roundly asserted himself to be. The whole is fulsome to nausea.

The Mirror outHerods Herod. We hear this unique journal, besides the usual obituary falsehoods of the other, has praised the deceased for his liberality. He Did good by stealth and blushed to find it fame!

Yes, it was a remarkable case. Not only did his right hand not know what heart's blood was extracted from his left, but he was not himself conscious of his loss. And well for him and his people that it was so. The knowledge would only have made him restless and them miserable too. He would not have rested till he had recouped himself. His charity was a profound secret beyond men and gods—unless he made a timely provision for elegiacs and epitaphs in a struggling press.

The panegyrist has ignored his character as a Zemindar. He was a bloated absentee. He was not without merit, however. He was sober and continent.

The only people who affect to be indignant with us for telling the truth, if not to sympathise with him, are those who love not this paper for its unamiable weakness, and the upstarts and hypocrites and pretenders of all kinds who have cause to be afraid of its outspokenness. We have received from all sides expressions of satisfaction at our courage and devotion to duty in a thankless and thoroughly unpleasant cause, from persons whose opinion is valuable. One young person only has taken the trouble to write in protest. As he is wellknown to be afflicted with the cacoethes scribendi, we need not care. We will not humour him with printing his unmannerly abuse, without facts or argument. The more so as his communication appears to have been rejected in other quarters for which it was expressly composed.

Still less do we care the beasts who are openly trying to minimise the moral of our lay sermon, by assuring the boys that their father was quite within his right to ride his own carriage in an indecent posture in a public drive. What can we feel but contempt for the officious men—beggars on horseback at last—who are ostentatiously going about trying to put us in court for writing which they are not able to parse.

CIVIL COURTS REFORM.

In India during the time of Hindu Rajas the administration of justice was considered to be a bounden duty of sovereigns, and subjects were allowed to have their dissensions decided without having their pockets touched. But now we find that litigation has increased beyond all proportions and its cost does not know any bounds. If any person desires to ascertain the present impecunious circumstances of this country, I believe he will take the cost of litigation to be one of the principal causes. The cost which the party pays does not go to maintain the civil establishment, but increases the revenue of the state. Sir Richard Garth, late Chief Justice of Bengal, has censured the Government for selling justice. The establishment is maintained by the Government at a nominal cost. No party can obtain from his sovereign redress of his grievances or even approach the courts without a preliminary paying, more or less. Suppose a person institutes a suit for Rs. 1,000 and the case is decreed ex parte. It does not take the Judge's time more than five minutes and the plaintiff should pay the entire cost when he instituted the suit. Now a person who is incapable of repaying his just debt is saddled with an enormous cost for which he could not accuse the plaintiff. The Government shows the greatest solicitude for the welfare of its subjects by disallowing appeals in Small Cause Court cases and other petty suits. When the Court Fees Act was formulated it was said by the Government, if my memory serves me right, that the litigants should pay one-third and the Government the remaining part of the cost of judicial establishment. But now we find that quite the reverse is the case. It commonly happens that a person drawing a salary ranging between Rs. 200 and Rs. 400 is appointed Munsif and to help him there are one Sheristadar, drawing a pay of Rs. 40 to Rs. 60, and three Mohorurs drawing Rs. 20 to Rs. 30 each per month, one Nazir and Accountant drawing Rs. 30 to Rs. 40 and Rs. 20 to Rs. 40 respectively, and comparing clerk drawing Rs. 20 to Rs. 30, besides a few peons. These officers are entrusted with most responsible business, but their pittance is no better than that of an ordinary menial of a gentleman. They are men of good birth and of good education. Their hours of business are not from 11 A.M. to 5 P.M. as in all Government offices, but they are compelled to transact all business however enormous it be no matter whether it be Sabbath or holiday. They have no fixed office hours. They come at dawn in court, return home at 10 A.M. and taking breakfast within half an hour, like a saddled horse, repair to the court before the Munsif takes his seat and labour till dusk. Your readers may well conceive how the constitution of these officers is undermined by such over work; and you may well imagine that it is not unnatural for men drawing such a poor pay to fall into temptations, with families at home to support, children to educate, daughters to marry and their own expenses to defray. These officers are not to be blamed for the charge of corruption which is always levelled against them. It is the Government which compelled them to resort to such mean acquisitions. The people pay heavily for the litigation, the officers having charge of it are insufficiently paid, and our Christian Government makes capital out of it. Now what more preposterous can there be? The litigants do not get speedy relief. A simple case of small value takes almost a year for disposal and a good many adjournments are made for no fault of the parties; and the cost incurred outweighs the relief granted. If the case goes up to the High Court it takes another two years for final adjudication, and the parties have to sell their properties to meet the expenses. Such cases are not isolated but are of ordinary occurrence. The present business of the Civil Court is more than enough, and the Calcutta Municipal Act has enjoined that the owners of holdings should pay rates and realize them from the occupiers by help of the Civil Courts, unlike the former procedure. The establishment of the Civil Court is quite inadequate to meet the demands of the people. A chowkee consisting of two, three, or of four Munsifs has only one Nazir, one accountant and one comparing clerk. Now if the disposal of the file of the chowkee referred to above requires more munsifs than one, it is difficult to understand why the Government appoints a single officer on such slender pay for transacting business of such enormous magnitude. The Legislature is theoretically wise, but does not care how the law is administered. When the present Rent law was enacted it was the aim of the Government to have the rent cases decided speedily; but now we find that even in ex parte cases, adjournments are granted for want of time.

Lately Mr. Stevens was appointed a Commissioner for the reform of the Civil Courts; but Heaven knows what has become of his report. Most probably it has been pigeon-holed in the Secretariat. Does it not speak ill of the Government that it derives an income of Rs. 35,00,000 per annum after covering all expenditure in Bengal?

People pay handsomely for relief and yet they do not get it. The officers draw miserable pay. They are even denied the casual leave to which they are entitled, and the State derives a sovereign income by these means. Some members of the Subordinate Judicial Service applied for privilege leave on the occasion of their daughters' marriage, mothers' sradh, &c., and the Hon'ble High Court did not think it proper to grant the leave even on such solemn business which every Hindu even at the risk of his life is enjoined by religion to celebrate. Europeans of the celestial Civil Service are allowed furlough even on slightest occasions. The Indians are born to serve, no matter if their health be shattered, religious scruples wounded and social duties neglected. This is a serious question and there is very little hope of redress at the hands of our bureaucratic administration. But we have profound respect towards the British public, and as they are always kindly disposed for the weak and helpless, we hope the above will attract their attention and relieve the helpless British subjects from these unspeakable grievances.

Public Papers.

REVENUE, No. 25.

India Office, London, 27th March, 1890.

To His Excellency the Most Honourable the Governor-General of India in Council.

MY LORD MARQUIS,—I have considered in Council Your Excellency's letter No. 29 (Separate Revenue), dated the 4th February, with enclosures, concerning the Excise Administration in different parts of India. When I forwarded a copy of the Resolution passed by the House of Commons on the 30th April 1889, I expressed my belief that the Government of India and the Local Governments accepted and were carrying out the principles recited in my Despatches, and approved by the House of Commons, for the guidance of all authorities concerned with Excise affairs in India. The full and interesting accounts contained in your present letter, and in the enclosed papers, confirm the view taken in my Despatch of the 16th May 1889. The detailed information now furnished places, in important particulars, a different complexion on some of the matters mentioned during the debate in the House of Commons on the 30th April; and steps have already been taken to procure the presentation of these papers to Parliament.

2. I shall not trouble Your Excellency with a detailed review of all the many topics discussed in your comprehensive letter, which affords valuable evidence of the careful consideration given, both recently and in past times, by the Government of India and by the subordinate Governments to the intricate problems of Indian Excise Administration. I consider these papers demonstrate among other things—

- (1) that total prohibition of all traffic in intoxicating spirits and liquors is not possible in India;
- (2) that while absolute local option in Excise matters is not feasible, weight can be, should be, and is given to local opinion in regard to licensing liquor shops;
- (3) that the only practicable way of repressing intemperance among the drinking classes of India is to restrict opportunities for drinking, and to levy on intoxicants as high a revenue as may be possible without promoting smuggling;
- (4) that by reason of the circumstances of the country, and according to actual experience in many parts, illicit dealings in and consumption of liquor occur when vigilance is relaxed, or when restrictions on lawful trade are pressed too far;
- (5) that diversities of circumstances and of tastes in the many countries which compose India render differences of practice and of results in the several Provinces unavoidable, even though the same principles are everywhere followed;
- (6) that, so far as information is available, the Excise system or practice of Native States is less stringent, and tends less to check intemperance than the system and practice of adjacent British districts with similar inhabitants;

- (7) that the increase of the Excise revenue during the past twenty years, though in part due to enhanced consumption caused by the growth of population and by the general increase of earnings, is yet largely, and in some localities mainly, the result of improved Excise administration, which doubled or trebled the rates of liquor duty, and has at the same time restricted the use of illicit intoxicants;
- (8) that there has been of late years much reduction in the number of licensed liquor shops, notably in Bengal, where there are now 4,539 licensed spirit shops as compared with 8,937 licensed in the year 1871-72, but that there is room for further reduction in some Provinces;
- (9) that the action of Indian public servants in Excise affairs is not warped, and their evidence on such topics is not vitiated by the duty which lies upon them to administer the public revenue to the best advantage on the principles and under the rules laid down for their guidance.

3. I fully accept the general principles stated at the 103rd paragraph of Your Excellency's letter as those which should guide the Local Governments and their revenue officers in administering Excise affairs. I consider that, save under very exceptional circumstances and in strictly limited areas, the central distillery system of Excise management should be preferred to the farming system or the outstill system. The former system provides that all licit spirit shall pay a still-head duty per gallon proportionate to its alcoholic strength, whereas the other two systems permit, if they do not stimulate, the production and sale of large quantities of comparatively cheap spirit, even when effort is made to limit the capacity of stills, and to prescribe a minimum retail price.

4. I am confident that, as I stated in May 1889, Your Excellency's Government and the Local Governments are fully as desirous as I am, or as the House of Commons can be, to prevent the increase of drinking habits and of intemperance among the people of India; and I anticipate that the discussions of the past two years,—even though aspersions, which I believe to be incorrect, have fallen upon Indian Excise arrangements,—will have done good by strengthening the hands of your officers, and of the people themselves, in their efforts to restrict within the narrowest limits the evils that are unhappily inseparable from the popular use of intoxicating liquors and drugs.

CROSS.

TRANSFER RULES FOR COLLEGES AND HIGH SCHOOLS.

GENERAL DEPARTMENT—EDUCATION.

Calcutta, the 20th May, 1890.

RESOLUTION.

Read again the following papers :—

Resolution recorded by the Government of India in the Home Department, No. 6/371-383, dated the 17th August 1889.

Letter to the Director of Public Instruction, No. 76T—G, dated the 7th October 1889.

Transfer rules for colleges and schools appended to the Resolution recorded by this Government, dated the 13th September 1887.

Read also—

Letter from the Director of Public Instruction, No. 1995, dated 16th April 1890.

In the Resolution of the Home Department cited in the preamble, the Government of India suggested that inter-school rules, defining the conditions under which pupils should be allowed to pass from one school to another, should be extended to all schools aided by public funds, as a condition of the continuance of such aid; and that the Senates of the Universities should be invited to use their influence to procure the adoption of this system in schools and colleges which do not receive aid from Government. The essential points which it is necessary to secure by the inter-school rules were further stated to be, that without the consent of the Educational authorities a boy shall not be taken into a school who has been dismissed from another school for misconduct; that failing to pay his school fees in his former school shall debar a boy from admission to another school, except under similar consent of the Educational authorities; and that, if received into another school, a boy shall not be placed in a higher class than the class he was in before leaving the other school, except at the beginning of a new term.

2. In accordance with the above views, the Director of Public Instruction has submitted revised inter-school rules, as appended to this Resolution, and has suggested that Circle Inspectors should be authorised to issue simplified rules based upon them to govern the transfer of pupils in middle and primary schools. The Lieutenant-Governor approves the rules and the suggestion of the Director of Public Instruction.

3. The Syndicate of the Calcutta University have expressed their desire to co-operate fully with the Education Department in the maintenance of discipline, and are prepared to give their careful attention to any case of infringement of the rules that may be reported to them.

ORDER.—Ordered, that a copy of the Resolution and of the Rules be forwarded to the Director of Public Instruction for information and guidance.

Ordered also, that a copy of the Resolution, as well as of the Rules, be published in the Calcutta Gazette.

By Order of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal,
P. NOLAN,
Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

TRANSFER RULES FOR COLLEGES.

I.—A student, before he is admitted to a college, shall be required to produce a transfer certificate from the Principal of the college in which he has last been reading. But if he applies at the beginning of a session, without having joined any other college, for admission to the first-year or to the third-year class, the certificate of having passed the last Entrance or First Arts Examination respectively shall be accepted in lieu of such certificate. A student who has failed at the First Arts or the B. A. Examination, and has not meanwhile joined any other college, may be admitted in the following session to the second or fourth-year class of the college, on production of the Registrar's receipt. The fact of his admission, with the date, should be written across the face of the receipt.

II.—The certificate shall run as follows :

Certified that _____ son of _____ _____, an inhabitant of _____ has been a student in the _____ class of the College from _____ to _____ 18 _____. His character and conduct have been _____. All sums due by him to the College have been paid, including college fees upto _____.
His scholarship of Rs. _____ per mensem has been drawn and paid to him in this college up to _____. His attendance in each course of lectures is given below :—

Subject. Number of lectures delivered. Number of lectures attended.

Dated _____

Principal.

III.—Application for a transfer certificate must be made, either personally or by letter (registered, if necessary) to the Principal of the college; and when so made the certificate is to be given without any avoidable delay. The only grounds on which it can be refused are (1) gross misconduct; (2) failure to pay the sums due to the college, including tuition fees and fines and transfer fee (if any). If a certificate is refused, the cause of refusal shall be notified in writing to the applicant.

IV.—Any instance of "gross misconduct" on the part of a student, whether followed by expulsion or not, must be at once notified to the Department, failing which no future action can be taken on it. A student expelled for misconduct cannot be admitted to another college without the express sanction of the Director of Public Instruction.

V.—For the purposes of the transfer certificate, the date on which a student presents his application for transfer, or the date of receipt of the letter (Rule III), shall be regarded as the date upon which his connection with a college ceased, and no fee shall be charged to him for any subsequent month. But if the student does not pay the sums due from him to the college within three days of his receiving intimation of their amount, he shall be treated as "absent without notice" until such sums are paid, subject (as regards any further sums so accruing) to the limit stated in Rule VI.

VI.—A student quitting a college without notice shall be liable to pay fees, together with fines for absence, for one month subsequent to that in which he last attended the college, after which his connection with the college shall be considered to have ceased.

VII.—A student quitting a college, except at the close of a session, shall be liable to pay a transfer fee before obtaining his certificate. The transfer fee shall not (except under special orders of the Department in the case of free colleges) exceed the ordinary monthly fee of the class.

VIII.—For students sent up to the First Examination in Arts or to the B. A. Examination, the session ends in May; for other students it ends in February, the month preceding that in which the new second and fourth-year classes are formed.

IX.—If a student withdraws from a college after the Durga Puja Vacation, he shall be liable to pay fees in that college up to the end of the session.

X.—A student shall not be sent up to the University examination until he has paid all sums due to the institution in which he has been reading, including fees up to the end of the session in May.

XI.—When a student has held a scholarship, free studentship, or half-pay studentship, under express stipulation in writing, signed by himself, that the whole or a portion of the sum drawn by or remitted to him shall be refunded to the college in case of withdrawal from it within a certain period, the transfer certificate may be withheld until the sums so due have been repaid, provided that the amount so claimed shall not exceed the amount actually drawn or remitted.

XII.—The transfer of Government scholarship-holders shall be subject to the previous sanction of the Director of Public Instruction, which will be withheld unless satisfactory reasons are assigned for the transfer.

XIII.—A student who has failed at the test examination (if any is held) of his college shall not be sent up to the University examination as a student of any other college.

XIV.—All questions arising between one Principal and another respecting the enforcement of these rules shall be referred as soon as possible to the Director of Public Instruction.

XV.—If a student be found producing a false document or making a false statement as to his attendance at any college, he shall be liable to expulsion and shall be reported to the Department.

XVI.—Wilful transgression or colourable evasion of any of the foregoing rules will render a college liable to forfeit the right of sending up candidates for senior scholarships and to be reported to the University for further penalties.

THE CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

LOAN NOTIFICATION.

1. The Commissioners of Calcutta are prepared, with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, given under Section 404 of Act II. (B. C.) of 1888, to open a Debenture Loan for Rs. 20,00,000 on the security of the rates, taxes and dues imposed and levied under the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act 1888.

2. The Debentures will have a currency of thirty years from the 1st October 1890, and will bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st April and 1st October of each year.

3. The form of Debenture-bonds will be that given in the twelfth schedule of Act II. (B. C.) of 1888.

4. No Debentures will be issued for any sum less than Rs. 500, and above that amount Debentures will be issued only for even sums of Rs. 100.

5. Tenders for the whole or any part of the above loan will be received by the Secretary to the Corporation up to 2 o'clock P. M. of Thursday, the 19th June 1890.

6. Each tender must be made out in the form annexed to this Notification and enclosed in a sealed cover addressed to the Secretary to the Corporation, and superscribed "Tender for Municipal Loan of 1890-91."

7. Each tender must be accompanied by Government Promissory Notes, Currency Notes or Cheques for not less than 3 per cent. of the amount tendered.

8. When a tender is accepted the deposit, when made in currency notes or cheques, will be held as a payment in part of the amount tendered, and will bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the 19th June 1890, provided that the whole amount tendered is paid up in the manner hereinafter prescribed, but no debenture will be issued for the sum so deposited so long as the entire amount of the tender is not paid.

9. The deposits or tenders which may not be accepted, will be returned on application, and no interest will be payable on such deposits. If an allotment after being made is not taken up and the full amount allotted is not paid as hereinafter prescribed, the deposit will be forfeited.

10. The rate at which a tender is made, must be specified in rupees, or rupees and annas; a tender in which the rate is not so specified, will be rejected as null and void.

11. The rates stated in a tender must not contain any fraction of an anna. If a rate containing a fraction of an anna is inserted in any tender, such fraction will be struck out, and the tender treated as if the rate did not contain such fraction of an anna.

12. The amount of the accepted tenders must be paid into the Bank of Bengal in the following instalments :—

One third on 19th July 1890, one-third on 19th August 1890 and one-third on 19th September 1890.

Parties whose tenders are accepted will have the option of paying all or any of the instalments before the dates specified above, and will receive interest from the date of such payment.

13. Anticipation interest will be paid on all instalments from the respective dates on which such instalments are paid into the Bank of Bengal to the 30th September 1890.

14. In the case of two or more tenders at the same rate a pro rata allotment will be made (if the tenders are accepted), but no allotment will be issued if the amount distributable on any tender is less than Rs. 500.

15. A minimum having been previously fixed, tenders will then be opened by the Loan Committee of the Commissioners at 2-30 P.M., on Thursday, the 19th June 1890, at the Municipal Office.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News, October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

HOME.

HOME! in that word how many hopes are hidden,
How many hours of joy serene and fair;
How many golden visions rise unbidden,
And blend their hues into a rainbow there!

Round home what images of beauty cluster,
Links which unite the living with the dead,
Glimpses of scenes of most surpassing lustre,
Echoes of melody whose voice is fled!

Home is the place where we have ever blended
Our hopes and happiness, our tears and sighs,
Whence our united worship hath ascended,
As grateful incense to the listening skies.

Where we have nourished bright thoughts while beholding
Some sun-eyed flower, the centre of our love;
And while we watched its gradual unfolding,
The angels came and carried it above.

Scenes gay and glad some at the golden glory
Which decks the death-bed of departing day,
And many an old and spirit-stirring story,
Whose memory is fading fast away.

Flash o'er the spirit as the oft repeated
And never to be forgotten accent, Home!
Friends whom a thousand times our love has greeted,
With whom our merry boyhood loved to roam.

A father's joy, a mother's deep devotion,
Untiring energy and constant care,
The reverential love, the pure emotion,
The evening hymn, the heavenward wafted prayer;

The Sabbath bells, whose glad and gentle pealing,
Falls on the spirit like the early dew,
Evoking every high and holy feeling,
All that hath "power to chasten and subdue!"

Sisters and brothers fondly loved and cherished,
Our comrades then in the stern march of life,
The early called who fought and fighting perished,
And left us single-handed in the strife;

The woods and waters where our childhood flourished,
The hoary hills our wandering footsteps trod,
The fairy prospects which our fancy nourished,
The old church spire which pointed us to God;

Such are the visions which are ever stealing
Around our spirits wheresoe'er we roam,
Full fraught with beautiful and hallowed feeling,
Evoked like phantoms by the spell of home.

Needs there a beautiful ancestral mansion
To mark the spot where household joys abide,
Bounded on all sides by a broad expansion
Of lawns and level meads and woodlands wide?

Need there be sunny slopes and pastures sweeping,
In glad and verdant beauty far away,
Old forest trees and crystal waters sleeping
In tranquil silence in the sunset's ray?

Need there be twilight groves and orchards shedding
Their purple plenty on the fertile ground;
Brooks flashing back the noontide beam while threading
Gardens and meads with many a merry round?

No! home is not confined to halls of pleasure,
To regal pomp and dwellings of the great;
It is not meted to us by the measure
Which appertains to things of low estate.

Where'er we find warm hearts and fond affection,
Whether in straw-thatched hut or gilded dome,
We find what claims our notice and reflection,
We find the primal elements of home.

On Alpine mountains where the hunter buildeth
His fragile dwelling like an eagle's lair;
In southern climates where the sun-light gildeth
The vine-clad hills with colors ever fair.

In Arctic regions where the winter heapeth,
In hoary piles, the everlasting snows;
Where the poor persecuted negro weepeth
His kidnapped kindred and his country's woes;

Where'er of fellow-men we find the traces,
Where'er a wanderer hath his footsteps bent,
In populous cities and in desert places,
The Indian's wigwam and the Arab's tent;

In far-off islands where the savage roameth,
The untutored lord of many a scene sublime,
In groves and glens and where the ocean foameth,
In every country and in every clime;

Mankind, however fettered and benighted,
Howe'er oppressed by penury and care,
Have their existence by one beacon lighted,
Have still one bliss which all may freely share.

Home ! cries the world-sick wanderer as he wendeth,
With baffled footsteps, o'er his weary way ;
Home ! sighs the wretched outcast as he sendeth
A longing look, whence once he longed to stray.

- Home ! says the toil-worn rustic when returning
From daily labor at the fall of night ;
Home ! sings the emancipated soul as spurning
This world of woe, it plumes its wings for flight.

Home like the burning lens collects together
Into one point affection's scattered rays,
And in the sternest storm, the wildest weather,
Kindles a bright and spirit-cheering blaze.

Home is the watchword firing with emotion
The patriot's heart, and nerving him to fight ;
Home is the pole star, o'er the storm-swept ocean,
Guiding the sailor through the gloomy night.

Home cheers the solitary student, burning
With high and heavenward hopes till he has furl'd
His wings of fire upon the heights of learning ;
• Home is the lever that can lift the world.

A never-failing source of consolation,
A fountain sealed with hidden virtue fraught,
The pilgrim's prayer, the poet's inspiration,
The nurse of every noble deed and thought.

Home is a boon to erring mortals given,
To knit us closer in the bonds of love,
To lead our spirits gently up to heaven,
To shadow forth the brighter home above.

J. W. FLETCHER.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

A GOOD book has appeared in England under the name of Impressions of Russia. Translated from the Danish of Dr. George Brandes, by Samuel C. Eastman. A keen observer, Dr. Brandes had great opportunities for understanding Russian character and institutions. The condition of Russian society is sad indeed. One fact is better than a dozen speculations. Dr. Brandes reports that, in 1887, at the height of hostile feeling between Germany and Russia, when war was expected to break out every moment, the most intelligent and patriotic Russians, in every part of the country, prayed for defeat, as the only way of escape from a hated crushing incubus. God save the Queen ! May the British Power endure at Home and abroad ! And may we remain out of the range of the Great Bear's paw, and free from all Continental contagion, autocratic or constitutional !

OUR native readers will please take note that tomorrow is the anniversary of the death of that friend of native education—David Hare. The place is Dr. Sircar's Science Association, and the hour 5-30 in the afternoon. The Secretary, Mr. N. N. Ghose, will lead the discussion with an address quaintly entitled, "Our Educational News." It will be worth listening to, we are sure. Mr. Ghose bears a headpiece on his shoulders, and he is besides thoroughly acquainted with his subject. Admission free.

NEWS gains shape and volume as it travels from mouth to mouth or newspaper to newspaper. The People's Friend of Madras ascribes the death of Mr. Macaulay, the Bengal Secretary, at Calcutta, to Influenza.

THE income tax will not be levied on fines. That is, the pay of a Government servant for purposes of the tax will be less the fine inflicted. That is hardly a concession. The amount deducted as fine is not an earning. But it has cost not a little discussion to the Government to arrive at this elementary conclusion.

LORD Rayleigh recently read a paper on "Foam" at the Royal Institution in London. He said the liquids which foamed were essentially impure, contaminated—in fact, dirty. Sea water foamed not for the salt, but for the weeds and the destruction they underwent from breakers in rough weather.

FUMIGATION of sulphur as a destructive of disease germs is considered out of date in the New World, and is to give way to currents of steam. Dr. J. G. Johnson read a paper before the King's County Medical Society, shewing that the fumes of burning sulphur did not penetrate woollens as do disease germs. He further emphasised his verdict by relating that he had propagated diphtheria from the clippings of blankets after they had undergone thorough orthodox fumigation. The experience of Dr. Prudden, of the New York City Board of Health, tends to the same conclusion against the efficacy of sulphur fumigation.

THE French sub-marine boat Goubet has again been tried at Cherbourg, with unprecedented success. The usual evolutions over, she was lowered to a depth of two mètres under water, and thus passed under five torpedoes, representing a torpedo-depôt attached to an English ship. Afterwards she plunged down and worked for two hours, severing one after another the attachments of five buoys, wedging with an iron bar the screw of the Korigan, and placing under a raft a false torpedo of 102 kilogrammes. There were many gentlemen, officials, military officers, and independent men, including the officers and crew of a Russian ironclad anchored in the harbour, present. They all seemed greatly impressed.

ACCORDING to the New York Times, the pneumatic dynamite gun which will be shipped to England for test at Shoeburyness, is the design of Captain Rapiéff. The English Board will decide whether preference is to be given to the electrical fuze invented by Captain Zalinski or the mechanical fuze of Mr. H. F. Merriam. A second mechanical fuze, the invention of Captain Rapiéff himself, will be submitted to the English Board. The speciality of this fuze is that it is placed in the rear of the projectile instead of the head.

THE Calcutta Mahomedan Literary Society's petition to the House of Commons having been presented, was communicated to the press in this country and received a fair share of attention. By this week's mail we see that it is attracting notice in England. The Overland Mail of the 9th May devotes its only leading article to it. As it is short, we quote it entire :—

"The last report of the House of Commons' Committee on petitions contains a petition from the Committee of Management of the Mahomedan Literary Society at Calcutta, which we reprint. It was presented by Sir R. Temple, and makes a strong protest on behalf of the Indian Moslems against the proposal to introduce into India the elective principle. It also expresses satisfaction with the Indian Councils Bill in the form in which it passed the House of Lords. This influential exponent of Mahomedan opinion declares that, 'owing to the peculiar religious and social circumstances of India the country is not yet fit for the exercise of such privileges, and it is their firm belief that, should election form the basis of any portion of the contemplated legislation on the subject of Indian Councils, the Mahomedan community, though numbering some fifty millions, will be at the mercy of a strong and compact Hindoo majority, whose notions of right and expediency are so different in many vital points from those entertained by the Mahomedans.' This is not only the opinion of the bulk of intelligent Mahomedans throughout India, but it is a warning of the consequences that would ensue upon any attempt to hasten the development, however desirable in theory, of representative institutions in a congeries of vast provinces and various classes so wholly unfitted for such institutions as the Indian Empire. Indeed, as yet, as is shown in the letter we print to-day from the most distinguished of the advocates of Indian political reform, on whose letter to the Times we lately commented, no practical scheme of representation for India has really been propounded. He entirely throws over the rash and raw scheme which Mr. Bradlaugh, much against his own judgment, if we are correctly informed, has been induced by the extreme Congress people to submit to Parliament ; but he pronounces in favour of the election by public bodies. We reiterated in our recent article the objections to this proposal, which some time since were advanced in a series of leaders in these columns, and as yet we have seen no satisfactory reply. In fact, of the two schemes we cannot help thinking that that of Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill is fairer and more reasonable than the proposal to create such a limited and sham electorate as one composed of a few municipalities, Chambers of Commerce, and Universities. With what possible justice could the elected of such an oligarchy be granted an influential voice in legislation for the whole Indian Empire ? We have the highest respect for the writer of the letter, and believe that he and his friends are sincerely anxious to offer counsels of moderation to the extremist spirits of the Congress party, but we confess we cannot understand how any Radical reformers can advocate a scheme for handing over the election of independent members of the Legislative Councils to bodies which are so imperfectly representative of the interests and wishes of the general body of the vast and various populations of India."

Mr. James Naughty, the inventor of the hammer bearing his name, died last month in London. He was born in 1808, in Edinburgh. He died of no illness but of old age. At the age of 48, he retired from business and then devoted his time and attention to astronomy.

ON the 26th April last, the Madura Mail published the news that "Nawab Khurshed Jah Bahadr of Hyderabad arrived at Madura on the morning of the 23rd instant on his way to Rameswaram. He was putting up at the Venkatasami Naiker's chatram and left Madura yesterday morning at 9 O'clock." This palpably wrong news was corrected in the next issue of the paper. But M. V. Appasami Naidu, son of the deceased founder of the chatram and present manager of the institution for the accommodation of Hindu travellers and pilgrims, considers that the original paragraph was maliciously put in in that newspaper to injure the prestige and reputation of the chatram, to annoy the present manager, to blacken and defame the memory of the founder, and to stir up the hatred and evil will of the people against his family, and has accordingly sued the paper for damages fixing his loss at Rs. 100.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Russian difficulty of Turkey has been tided over. The Sick Man—and bankrupt into the bargain—stood upon his rights. The Russian Ambassador at Constantinople made over the five Turkish officers who were detained by him for indecently assaulting the wife and daughter of the Chief Dragoman to the Russian Embassy. These five officers have since been courtmartialled to six months' imprisonment. They will be afterwards banished for life to Tripoli. The Russian Ambassador has expressed himself satisfied. We hope no private assurance was previously given him as to how the courtmartial would deal with the five prisoners.

THE Directors of the Comptoir D'Escompte and Société Des Métaux have been tried for fraud and infringement of the law of companies. Three have been found guilty and sentenced, M. Secretan to six months' imprisonment with a fine of ten thousand francs, M. Laveissière to three months' with three thousand francs, and M. Hentsch to a fine of only three thousand.

IN a lecture on India at Edinburgh, Mr. Childers said that the great object of England should be to secure the sympathies of the people and thus continue in possession of India.

THE petition to Parliament from the rayyets of Jhenida and Magura has begun to bear fruit. Mr. Luson will be withdrawn from the subdivisions. If it were only done earlier! Of course, every effort will be made to sweeten the pill for the brother Civilian. It is understood that he will be promoted to the office of Magistrate in Moorsheadabad. At any rate, after the strong terms which we were compelled to use in our leader of last week in reference to the official proceedings in Jessore, we sincerely rejoice to learn so soon that the notorious Magistrate is to be transferred from a scene which requires an officer of known judgment and tact.

THE Inland Steam-vessels Act, 1884, is to be amended. The Calcutta Gazette of the week publishes the papers on the subject and invites representations till the 1st July, 1890. Is this previous publication due to the recent representations of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce?

THE following Notification appears in the Calcutta Gazette, Part IB., May 28, 1890, page 178 :—

"The 25th May 1890.—It is hereby notified that, under section 33, Act II (B.C.) of 1888, the Lieutenant-Governor is pleased to appoint Surgeon-Major R. Cobb to be a Commissioner of Calcutta, vice Mr. H. Lee, C.S., appointed Chairman of the Municipality.

H. J. S. COTTON,
Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal."

The section of the law alluded to runs thus :—

"In case of the death, resignation or disqualification of any Commissioner, a person shall forthwith be appointed or elected in his stead....., and such person shall remain a Commissioner for the residue only of the term for which the Commissioner in whose stead he was appointed or elected was originally appointed or elected : Provided that no act of the Commissioners, their officers, or of the Commissioners in meeting, shall be deemed to be invalid by reason only of the fact that the number of the Commissioners at the time did not amount to seventy-five ; or that a disqualified person has continued to act as a Commissioner ; or that any Commissioner has taken part in any proceedings in contravention of the provisions of section thirty-two."

Number seventy-five is the full complement of the Commissioners besides the Chairman and Vice-Chairman, and section thirty-two treats of disqualifications of a Commissioner. Mr. Lee was nominated a Commissioner in place of another Government Commissioner who had resigned. But Mr. Lee has not resigned his place on the Board as a Commissioner, and he is not disqualified under the Act by virtue of his elevation to the head of the Corporation. So there was no legal vacancy, whether by death, resignation or disqualification, to fill, and the appointment of the Surgeon-Major is a superfluity. He has therefore no place in the Corporation, and his presence there will expose the Corporation to illegality and will, we are afraid, nullify the action of the Corporation or its officers.

"The 27th May 1890.—The main stream of the river Ganges (or Pudda) having shifted to the north of mouzah Mirchadiar, that mouzah is now separated from the district of Rajshahye, and has become attached to the district of Nadiya. The Lieutenant-Governor accordingly sanctions the transfer of that mouzah, together with its subordinate villages or hamlets....., from the Civil, Criminal and Revenue Jurisdiction of Rajshahye to that of Nadiya, with effect from the 1st April 1890.

C. C. STEVENS,
Offg. Chief Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal."

Which District officer then exercised jurisdiction in the mouzah in April and up to 27th May? The mouzah is now declared to be included in the District of Nadiya from the 1st April. Up to the 27th May it had not been declared to have ceased to be part of Rajshahye. Any proceedings by the Rajshahye officers during the period are now declared invalid, while the Nadiya officers had not acquired any such jurisdiction. Mouzah Mirchadiar had therefore no Civil, Criminal, and Revenue District Administration from 1st April to 27th May 1890, and had ceased to be the Queen's dominion.

MR. Derry sued the Secretary of State for eight lacs of rupees, for breach of contract in connection with the construction of the Bellary-Kistna State Railway. The Madras High Court dismissed the suit, in a judgment of 16 printed pages foolscap delivered by Mr. Justice Shephard. The issues were—

"(1) Did the plaintiff and defendant enter into a contract in January and February 1884 for the construction of a railway between Nandicama tunnel and Cumbum? (4) Did plaintiff proceed with due diligence ; was he impeded in his work by the defendant's servants, and if so, is defendant responsible and to what extent? (5) Was there a contract on the 15th December 1884 in respect to the extension to the Gundalacama river? (6) Was there a further contract for a further extension referred to in the plaint? (10) What were the terms of the provisional adjustment referred to in the plaint and has the plaintiff committed any breach thereof? (15) Was there an agreement to submit to arbitration ; was there a breach thereof ; if so, by whom ; if the breach was committed by the defendant, is the plaintiff entitled to any and what damages? (17) Is the plaintiff's claim or any and what portion thereof barred by limitation?"

Nos. 12, 13 and 14 were struck out in the course of the hearing, 1, 4, 5, 6, 10, 15 and 17 were found for the defendant, the rest were not dealt with. The Judge holds there was no contract in law. The agreement to enter into a future contract without naming the terms was void, and each party was free to back out of the bargain. The plaintiff was entitled to no relief except to the remuneration for work actually done as contended for by the defence. In plain language, Derry was a fool to believe that he had the entire contract for the work. This may be good law, but we have not the least doubt that it is bad government. It is vain to talk of generosity, for officials seem to regard that as their own privilege. Still there is a justice beyond the four corners of the statute-book or of judicial precedents. Nor can it conduce to administrative efficiency, if Government stoops to take every advantage of the simplicity or trustfulness of those with whom it has dealings, whether employés or contractors. The State finds alike its honour and interest best in being above pettifogging as above peddling.

THE Cochin correspondent of the Travancore Times supplies some interesting items of news and gossip :—

"The Kist arrears collected by the Tehsildar at Chittoor, was, I am told, escorted to the Head Quarter Treasury at Ernacollam under the additional guard of a Christian constable. The constable abusing the trust imposed on him exchanged the money Dubbi for that containing stones and sealed it by the badge of his Police coat. This took place on the way at Trichoor. This opportunity was offered him when the revenue peon and the bandy-driver were away from the spot for refreshment and nature's call. On their return hue and cry was raised and the constable was searched. The money Dubbi was found in a Theen's house near Trichoor but not the constable. The amount recovered was Rs. 1,500 less than the sum of Rs. 30. The case is under enquiry before the Trichoor Tahr. Magte."

Then comes something more piquant :—

"I hear that a mango tree in the garden compound of Badake Mottam Samuham was struck by lightning and the mango tree which was the abode of a huge serpent since died, was cut by a Mopha contractor for rafters, a big manikum was found in the body of the tree and was sold to one Govinda Pandithan, a merchant, for Rs. 40 : some enquiries [sic] between the parties were complained of and subsequently I learn a regular complaint was filed before the Magistrate. I think the right of claiming the emerald belongs to the Cochin Government and will be claimed for accordingly."

We wish our contemporary's writer could procure the plaint and lay it before the public. It would be interesting too to read the precise terms in which the Cochin Durbar might lay its claim. The suggestion, of course, is that the serpent was a true Nag Raj or Yaksha, and that the royal jewel (manikum) belonged to him. The emerald is all right, we dare say, and may be of the finest water to boot. But then the snake—aye, there's the rub. We are anxious for the fate of the genius of the garden. Enquiry, we are afraid, will reduce the land monster, the huge tree serpent, to the level of the Great Sea Serpent.

The next news probably supplies a clue to the marvel. Trees down that coast seem to have the valuable property of crystallising into mineral matter. At any rate, we read in the same letter of another "find" :—

"At Vadadalay about 10 miles from Cochin, a Christian cooly while cutting a mango tree, found when digging the roots a big copper vessel containing numberless pure gold coins. I am told the owner of the tree found nearly 100 coins on the spot and the cooly hooked away with the vessel and was not heard of any more."

That is a more vulgar experience. Still it is not essentially different from the preceding one. The jewel was found in the body of one tree and the coins at the root of another. In both cases, they were deposited by human agency, and the story of the huge serpent killed by lightning in the case of the former is merely the surplusage of local superstition. Such deposits are customary in India in border districts.

THE Pioneer lately had a generously appreciative notice of native efforts in the cause of science in the Southern Presidency. Speaking of Mr. A. V. Nursingh Rao, F.R.A.S. and F. G. S., of the Vizagapatam Observatory, it says :—

"Mr. Nursingh Rao has for many years given himself up to observations and original research in astronomy and meteorology, while he has every year presented to Government and the public a volume of the results of his work in both these branches of science. But praiseworthy as these labours are, no one is less disposed than their author to take more than a share of the credit of them, for equal to his devotion to science is his regard for the name and fame of the original founder of the Observatory—the late highly-esteemed Mr. G. V. Jagga Rao, a wealthy zemindar of former days. This gifted Hindu gentleman, who had an absorbing passion for scientific pursuits, and who invented several meteorological instruments to this day the best of their kind, built in 1841 the Observatory which bears his name. The link between the living and the deceased astronomer is the daughter of the latter and the wife of the former, Sri Ankitham Achayamma Garu. This public-spirited lady resolved that the good work begun by her father should not cease with him, and instigated her husband to continue it, with the result already noticed. But science does not stand still, and the original Observatory had soon to give place to the present large and noble structure which is stocked with the most modern instruments and appliances. To give perpetuity to this institution this lady has further assigned by deed of trust and set apart for its maintenance and management the munificent sum of three lacs of rupees, and has asked the Government of Madras after her death to take over all the buildings. But wealth can do more than endow observatories or contribute to the advancement of science : it can feed the hungry and relieve the distressed, and this use of it has not been forgotten by the heiress of her father's riches. In times of famine and of scarcity the portals of Daba Gardens fly open, and as many hundreds as can be ministered to are daily saved from the pangs of hunger or have other wants supplied. No wonder then that the poor, the needy and the tenantry of this generous benefactress know her only by the name of 'the Rani,' which, it is hoped, may only foreshadow a real title of the same nature by the powers that be."

It is strange nobody has yet thought of recommending these modest worthies to the notice of Government. We hope Lord Lansdowne, as a hereditary patron of genius, will call for a report from the local Government of the services of the good gentleman and the still better lady.

WE owe an apology to Babu Haridas Sastri, Director of Public Instruction, Jeypore State, for omitting to notice his interesting report on education in Jeypore for the last year. It is a record of considerable progress in several directions. For all the trumpeting in previous annual reports, it would now appear that Babu Haridas's predecessors left him a great deal to do as well to undo. Even proper and reliable statistics of education were not in existence when he joined his office, while the methods of instruction followed were susceptible of great improvement. In primary schools, the system of learning by rote was much too prevalent, and useful subjects like arithmetic, history and geography received little or no attention. These things had to be changed, and Babu Haridas had to contend with the old prejudices of the people who were wedded to the system in vogue, in order to carry out the reforms that were needed. A large measure of success appears now to have been attained, and we have great pleasure in congratulating the Director of Education in Jeypore and his officers on the good work they have done in the face of all their difficulties. There has been a marked increase in the number of pupils under all sorts of instruction from ten to sixteen thousand, which fact alone testifies to the energy which has been infused into the education department. As regards higher education, the progress made is equally creditable. The success of the students at the University examinations is remarkable, the percentage of passes having risen very much since the reorganization, under Babu Sastri's direction, of the higher schools and colleges. Two boys of the Maharaja's College have graduated with honors, being the first who obtained any University degree in Rajputana. Altogether, the great and arduous work of education in Jeypore has fallen in good hands, and Babu Haridas and his Inspectors have deserved well of the State.

A PRODIGIOUS blue-stocking is said to be in our midst under the name and style of Mrs. C. Mountford that was before Miss Von. Finkelstein. She was lately in Madras, and must be now somewhere in Bengal, so that some of our Baboos may, one of these days, feed an angel unawares. An accomplished Orientalist, specially strong in the life and costumes of the Lands of the Bible, she is now taking in the peoples of the Farther East, in order, doubtless, to augment her capacity of usefulness in her profession, which is that of popular lecturer. She has abandoned her intention of giving a course in India. We hope she might be prevailed upon to alter her mind. If she could here draw houses by tickets paid for, we would cordially vote her the most charming of charmers. For such a conquest she would be remembered with gratitude by all thoughtful friends of India. It would be no common service to the country to persuade our people to pay for instruction and enjoyment orally given out of school or college. They have no idea that lectures and discourses, recitations and readings, are, and ought to be, paid for. Hence the extreme inequality, not to say contemptible character, of the discourses usually delivered. It does not do to look a gift horse in the mouth, and accordingly every public bore, after his hour or two's infatuation on his audience, is sure of a vote of thanks duly proposed, seconded, maybe thirded—as at a meeting some years ago by a light of the Congress of this city—and carried nem con. Hence, there is here no profession of public lecturing. This important function is entirely left to the cruel mercy of wordy sciolists, fussy ignoramuses, and pretenders of all kinds. Readings and recitations are absolutely unknown. Our most enlightened men have no idea of such delightful entertainments as those of the Matheweses, of Albert Smith, or of Artemus Ward. Nor would they go to any such, even for half prices. We have yet many things to learn, and not the least important of them is to pay for such instruction and refined pleasure conveyed face to face by experts.

MR. Stanley's return has caused a furore throughout Europe. He has caused in England more than a royal interest and received an unprecedented reception. The Royal Geographical Society held a special seance in his honour. The late Governor of Madras, Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff, presided, with the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Edinburgh on either side of him. There was no end of magnates and notables on the scene, the front seats in the auditorium being occupied by the Princess of Wales, Princesses Victoria and Maud, the Duchess of Teck and the Princess Victoria of Teck. The chairman introduced the traveller, who delivered his address which was frequently cheered. At its conclusion, the vote of thanks to him was moved by the Prince of Wales in a neat speech. He said Mr. Stanley's name would go down to posterity as that of one of our greatest travellers and philanthropists. He recapitulated his career. Fifteen years ago, under the auspices of the New York Herald, Mr. Stanley went out to look for the great traveller Livingstone, and succeeded in finding him. He discovered the Congo, which had become now a great free State; and last, not least, he was sent by some philanthropic gentlemen to find and release Emin Pasha, the last of the lieutenants of [the ever-to-be-regretted Gordon. He asked the meeting to pass a hearty and unanimous vote of thanks to Mr. Stanley for his interesting address, and also to extend to him a hearty welcome on his return and to embrace in that welcome those brave and distinguished gentlemen who accompanied him.

The motion, seconded by the Duke of Edinburgh, was carried by acclamation.

The Prince of Wales now presented Mr. Stanley with the Society's gold medal specially struck for the occasion and bronze copies of it to the explorer's European staff—Lieutenant Stairs, Dr. Parke, Captain Nelson, Mr. Jephson, and Mr. W. Bonny.

Mr. Stanley returned thanks for himself and his officers, and the meeting ended with a vote of thanks to the Prince of Wales.

MR. Stanley's latest journey for the relief and rescue of Emin Pasha, the Governor of Equatorial Africa, occupied 987 days and extended over 6,000 miles. Of the 987 days, 500 were spent in the Central African forest and 487 in journeying through grasslands. He calculates the forest to be 621 miles long with an average breadth of 517 miles. He found this space with a compact area of 321,057 square miles covered with palm trees varying from 20ft in height, so close and interlaced as to form a ...thick shelter of black shades embower'd.

During the day, the sun is nowhere, and at night Chaos reigns

In double night of darkness and of shades.

Calculating the forest at 224,000,000 acres and allowing each tree thirty feet, the total number gives 10,752 millions of trees, leaving out of calculation the saplings and the undergrowth.

Mr. Stanley's next discovery was the pigmy race who have outlived the Pharaohs of Egypt and the empires of Nineveh, Persia, Rome and Macedon, holding their lands for over fifty centuries. The first man he named Adam and the first woman Eve. They were found in the midst of a wild Eden, peeling plantains. The man was four feet and the woman a little less high, only one of the 50 pigmies captured was 54 inches. The man might have weighed 85lbs. Their colour was of a half-baked brick. These people planted bananas amidst the prostrate forest trees, and an acre of bananas produced more food than an acre of wheat in England.

The other discoveries were the connection between Lake Albert Edward and Lake Albert, the famous Mountains of the Moon and the extension of Lake Victoria to the South-West. To the thoughtless question of many, What good had been derived from the expedition Mr. Stanley answers "to humanity the gain had been great. The world was richer by the knowledge that there were 10,000,000 more trees in it than they knew of before; that there were exhaustless quantities of gum and rubber; that there was navigation furnished by nature by which those interested in these articles could proceed to collect them; and by means of these vegetable products the millions of degraded human beings within that great forest would, in process of time, learn that their fellow-creatures had far vaster value than the value of their flesh. As a Christian nation also England should rejoice that the few thousand pounds devoted to the expedition had rescued over 400 men, women, and children from slavery, had returned 290 people to their homes in Egypt, and had restored an experienced African governor to active service. Then, as geographers, they must be gratified with the extension of their knowledge. That classical river, the Nile, they knew to its fountain-head; those lofty Mountains of the Moon, which had been anxiously sought for since Homer's time, had been located; the most glorious portion of inner Africa had been traversed for the first time, and they knew that there was scarcely an acre which was not a decided gain to our earth. Every mile of new land traversed by them would serve in coming time to stimulate British commerce and civilising industry. Finally, they had extended British possessions to the Eastern limits of the Congo. Their promise on setting out on this expedition was to do as little harm and as much good as possible."

WE find the subject of address at the Hare Anniversary tomorrow is "Our Educational Needs" not "News" as we were first led to suppose

LAST week, the result of the Entrance Examination was out. This week, the Calcutta University gives the names of the passed candidates in the B. A., the B. A. Honours, and the B. L. Examinations. In the B. A., the total successful number is 345. Honours have been won by 6 in the first division and 53 in the second in English; 2 in the first and 5 in the second in Mathematics; 3 in the first and 15 in the second in Philosophy; 2 in the first and 9 in the second in Physics; one in the first and 3 in the second in History; 2 in the first and 14 in the 2nd Sanskrit, 2 in the first and 2 in the second Latin; and 1 in the first and 5 in the second division in Persian. The B. L. results give 33 in the first, and 223 in the second division.

WE are glad that the Maharaja of Tipperah was able to conquer his misgivings and hesitation and make up his mind to accept Baboo Umakanta Das, of the Subordinate Executive Service of the Government of Bengal, for Minister to the Raj. He made formal application for the services of that officer for his administration. The request was complied with as a matter of course. The more so as it offered Government a fine opportunity for a little saving in these days without detriment to British interests. The office of Political Agent at Agartala was at best a sinecure from the first, and subsequent events have reduced the remnant thereof to an anachronism. Accordingly, the Agency at the capital of Tipperah with its Assistant is abolished, the Magistrate of the British District of Tipperah continuing as before Political Agent ex officio.

We sincerely congratulate the Maharaja on the new arrangement. Under all the circumstances of his character, his habits and occupations, his entourage, and the pass to which the administration has been reduced under his well-meaning, mild and amiable rule, it was the best possible thing for him and his people. A minister supported by the British Government and carrying the prestige of one who has long held the office of Assistant Political Agent at the court, is not only a guarantee for reform, but the only resource against bankruptcy and dismemberment—maybe the only safety for the old principality. Nor must we omit to congratulate, as we cordially do, Rai Umakanta Bahadour on the glorious career—worthy of the highest Bengali ambition—that opens to him. God grant him success!

A PETITION has gone up to the Governor for mercy to the Mohunt of Tripathy and for his release from jail. The universal sympathy for this Fuar Tuck is most discreditable to the native public of the South. It is positively sickening to see the gyrations of the writers on the press in stress of argument for the robber saint. But if the special pleading is specially feeble and contemptible, there is no lack of kindness and zeal for the holy convict. This Mohunt must be a true miracle worker, to have caused such a sudden and extraordinary change in the minds and consciences of all Hindu Madras. The spectacle of so many of the foremost in the land apologising for the bold bad man and desperate bully, and actively exerting themselves to stay the course of the Law's justice in his favour, is truly mournful. The entire Hindu community cuts a sorry figure before the Mahomedans, Jews, Christians and Parsees. These several communities will not be slow to point the moral of this public immorality to which the Hindus are pledged. With such an example of moral recklessness and infirmity of purpose before them, they have excuse enough to doubt the reality of the new-born pretensions to political freedom and social advancement of our brethren in the South. We can only hope that the Government will prove more firm than the governed. We confess we are not sorry that the convict's hard labour has been commuted to simple imprisonment. That was the utmost stretch of consideration which the Mercy of Justice could, without sacrificing herself, grant him. For the rest, his fate is of his own persistent in-

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Travellers to and from distant climes would do well to bear in mind that these changes and the altered diet and surroundings of their lives entail manifold risks to health. Occasions are sure to arise in which they will need a remedy such as these renowned Pills and Ointment, and no traveller by land or sea should ever fail to have a supply at hand. Then he may truly be said to have a physician always at his call for the various emergencies of travel. Chills and fevers should be promptly treated, and the printed directions should be carefully studied at the commencement of any illness, or Holloway's remedies can be safely used in all climates.

vitiation. The demonstrations in his behalf by the public are simply wasted. There should be but one language from all honest souls to priests like the Mohunt of Tripathy—a religiense without the slightest tincture of true religion:—

Feed fat, ye locusts, feed!
And, in your lofty temples, thank the Lord
That, from the faithful Hindoo's utter need,
Ye pile your own full board.

How long, O Lord! how long
Shall such a priesthood barter truth away,
And in thy name, for robbery and wrong
At thy own altars pray?

THE PROPOSED DEGRADATION OF THE PUNJAB UNIVERSITY.

CONSIDERING the pressure put upon the Calcutta University, resulting in the unprecedented number of candidates passed at this year's Entrance Examination, we are not surprised at the movement set on foot in the Punjab for lowering the standard of the local University. The strength of the movement is demonstrated by the alarm of the true friends of the Higher Education in the Land of the Five Waters. No one is, or ought to be, more anxious on the subject than the head of the University himself. His anxiety is not, thank God, the nervousness of a weak soul trembling before a danger and at his wits' end how to determine upon what to do. The Vice-Chancellor is a scholar and a public man with formed ideas and used to difficulties. He is not only not sleeping at his post, but is equal to, and ready for, the occasion. He called for the statistics of his department, and collected those of the sister Universities. Having with the zeal of an enthusiast obtained all available information, he compared and analysed his facts and figures with the acumen of a practised lawyer and controversist. Thus well equipped and armed at all points, he has repulsed the enemy with great slaughter. The intending innovators, beaten at every step, have been left not a leg to stand upon.

The movement against the existing standards came to a head at the recent Educational Conference in the Province. In a long and elaborate Minute brimming over with ability, Dr. Rattigan has replied to the proposals formulated by that Conference to lower the standard of the examinations. The reply is pervaded throughout by a charming courtesy, but his reasoning loses not a jot of force for the studied moderation of his expression. We for one are in perfect accord with him, and we need only add that we have every reason to hope that the various arguments which he brings in support of his view will carry conviction to the Senate before which the question now lies. The recommendations of the Conference are opposed to every sound principle of University education. The existing standard of pass marks has been in operation since the University was created, and the Conference has yet to show that it has been felt a practical hardship. Of course, to be entitled to relief, that hardship must be of a character to command the sympathy of those who appreciate the functions of a University. To us, judging from a distance, these proposals come with a suspicious leer, directly on the heels of the recent disclosures of Mr. Larpent's corrupt administration of the University. A University is an institution for the advancement of culture. It is an organ for the discovery of those who have been best prosecuting their studies. It offers a sort of hall-mark, which carries a recognised value in public estimation. Any attempt to reduce the standard is to confound the character of the machinery and upset the essential prestige of the University. The remarks made by Lord Lansdowne in his remarkable Convocation Address last year at Lahore on this subject, ought to be our guide. How in view of the Viceroy's strong opinion against a reduction of the standard, any such proposals could be made is, indeed, surprising. We have never been much in favor of the creation and multiplication of Universities. When the question of giving a University to the Punjab was first mooted, we felt some hesitation in supporting the movement. Our hesitation, however, was to a great extent removed by the fact that it was proposed to give the University a distinctly Oriental character. Still we were not altogether without misgivings as to whether the field was as yet fit for the experiment, and we find that these proposals for tinkering the rules of the University before they have been sufficiently long in operation, coupled with the discreditable revelations of the management of the Punjab University, show that our misgivings were not altogether imaginary.

THE PHILOSOPHER'S STONE, GRAPES, AND HEROES.

THE long, long search for the philosopher's stone, vain for mankind in general, has at length been crowned with success for our countrymen. Our patriots are rich in the possession of the miracle-working instrument which converts everything to gold. Every belonging of the Congress is precious—man, beast, or thing. All its cocks are hens—its crows are simply nightingales. Mr. Hume is of course the Maharshi—the Saint. Its very reporter is a light of the world. Mr. Reed, who came out with Mr. Bradlaugh to take notes of the last Congress at Bombay, and is now, in pursuance of the same employment, following the orators of the movement now in England, having said that the native Indian speakers at Bombay spoke as if English were their mother-tongue, our good friends are in ecstasies. And poor Mr. Reed, who is really a clever shorthand writer, is forthwith raised to the seventh heaven of the Congress's own. We are told,

"The testimony of so great a man is undoubtedly valuable and encouraging to our public speakers."

Fiddlesticks! The testimony of an educated man of experience in eloquence of the senate, the bar, and the platform, may be quite as valuable as even a professional reporter's, and the testimony of a practised speaker is, we conceive, far more valuable than that of a mere shorthand expert.

Our papers are complaining of the want of appreciation by Government of Bengali genius, virtue, and public spirit. Even the leaders of the Congress are left to pine in the cold shade of bureaucratic neglect. Speaking of the List of Honors on Her Majesty's late Birthday, one journal says:—

"But the names of the Bengalis are conspicuous by their absence in these big alphabetical titles."

After the first burst of querulousness, however, our contemporary recovers its composure and tries to be grand and virtuous. Says the editor:—

"Knowing as we do the manner in which titles are distributed in this country by our paternal Government, we have no reason to regret the paucity of Bengali names in the list."

Just so. Hang the grapes, they are so indisputably sour, if so tempting-looking! Let them hang on, or drop on the lap of the mean wretches that care for them! That is a wise reflection, if not particularly original. The writer finally clinches the point with an interrogation:—

"Are not Raja Sivaprasad and Printer Newolkishor recipients of such Government titles?"

Which tempts us to answer with another. And do you really think that these men do not deserve the consideration and honour shown them by Government? If you do, have you satisfied yourself on the point? No doubt, they have set their faces against the Congress. But is that a sufficient reason for their exclusion from the favour of their sovereign? Apart from the single crime of not joining the standard of the Congress, have they not many claims to respect? We do not insist on all the perfections in their behalf. But we believe they can fairly meet the tests of respectability of their respective classes of society in the country, though that is not saying much. At any rate, they do not starve their mothers or swindle their brothers, or trick their servants out of their just wages. Can as much be said for all your loudest and most eloquent patriots? Whatever the deficiencies of Raja Siva Prasad and Moonshee Newulkishore, we believe they have presented a better example for the country to profit by than the patent flesh and blood engines for the production of literary platitudes and political commonplaces. Both the Benaresi and the Agrawalla (now of Lucknow) were originally poor and obscure, but, by dint of hard and patient effort and ingenuity, they have risen to the pinnacle of wealth, influence and honour. How different your orators! They have been shamed at every step, and even found themselves within the four walls of a jail. What a life of noble enterprise, and successful too, has been that of each of our two fellow countrymen of Upper India! Nearly all enterprise is a public service, from its inspiring influence on the minds of the community. Some are, however, of a peculiarly public character, and of these were the enterprises of Siva Prasad and Newulkishore. Their work, while it advanced them in the world, reacted for the benefit of their nation. The former is more of a scholar, but the latter has promoted scholarship far more. The Caxton of Upper India, Newulkishore has, for the last thirty-five years, from his establishment at Lucknow, deluged India with literature of every pretension, new and old, and printed matter of every calibre, from voluminous encyclopædic works of solid worth like the Ayeeen Akberi and indeed the whole Akbernama and the most famous Epics and Masnavis and Kulliyats and Dewans down to dewana ghazels and thhoongris and ephemeral fly leaves. It is impossible to overestimate the work of this "unspeakable" printer. What the combined intellects and resources of many eminent men have done in Europe itself, has been achieved more quickly and without the least ostentation by this single Indian. And not in quest of fame or pompous parade of public good, has he done it, but in the far from sublime, though not disreputable, struggle for pence in which almost all mankind are madly engaged. Not in pursuit of pure philanthropy to be sure, but to thorough philanthropic purpose, nonetheless. And if honour comes to such a man, is that a public grievance? Should we not rather delight to honour such a man and pardon some faults in a great public benefactor? So of Siva Prasad. He has doubtless played his cards successfully in the game of life, like better men. That can form no excuse for public fret. It were more to the point to laugh at the simplicity of the magnates who could be so cheaply bamboozled. For the rest, the Jain is not the contemptible fellow that so many who know him not deem him. It was not simply by humouring the officials that he could rise from a common clerk or schoolmaster to the highest office in the Education Department open to a native in the North-Western Provinces. His service indeed commenced in the camp in the Panjab War. Transferred to the Education Department, he was of great help towards the spread of instruction in the Upper Provinces. He was enabled to do good work in a far more important way as an author. He was early struck by the literary destitution of his country, and the impossibility of advancing popular education without a body of sound elementary literature was felt by him every hour of his office and he strove to supply the want. He prepared himself for the purpose by considerable reading and meditation, and wrote book after book, from the most elementary primers to works of higher pretensions, which were adopted into the educational institutions of the country and formed the nucleus of the modern Hindi literature. Is such a man, because he happens to have political opinions of his own not in accord with raw fire-eaters, or other faults of manner and method, to be trampled under foot and made the mark for undying hostility?

THE NEW CALCUTTA PORT ACT.

THE Act to consolidate and amend the law relating to the Port of Calcutta and to the appointment of Commissioners for the said Port, otherwise called the Calcutta Port Act, 1890, passed by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal in Council and assented to by His Honor, received the assent of the Viceroy on the 15th May 1890. It repeals all the seven previous laws on the subject, and comes into operation from the first day of June 1890.

The Port Trust, under this law, will consist of a Chairman, a Vice-Chairman, and thirteen Commissioners to be known as Commissioners for the Port of Calcutta. The Local Government is given the power of appointing the Chairman, the Vice-Chairman and five of the thirteen Commissioners. The other eight Commissioners will be elected—five by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, one by the Calcutta Trades' Association, one by the Commissioners of the Town of Calcutta, and one by such body or bodies or firms as the Local Government shall, from time to time, select as best representing the interests of the native mercantile community. The Government would not openly recognize the native Chamber of Commerce,

That half-form'd insect on the bank of Nile—we mean the Ganges, or rather the Hoogly—which seems ushered into nebulous existence with the object of whitewashing a condemned criminal and smuggling him into society. "The election shall be made in such manner as may be determined by the electing bodies, subject to the approval of the Local Government." Is it the election or the manner of election that must be sanctioned by Government? All the Commissioners, elected or nominated, must go out on the expiration of two years, but are eligible for re-election or re-appointment. The remuneration, when any, of the two chief executives and of the Commissioners will be at the absolute discretion of Government under conditions and restrictions that may be attached. We hope Government will not sanction the appropriation of the fee of any absent Commissioner at a meeting. The objects of the Trust or rather the works to be constructed and carried out by the Commissioners are

(1) Docks, wharves, quays, stages, jetties and piers within the port, with all necessary and convenient arches, drains, landing-places, stairs, fences and approaches; and quarters and buildings necessary for the residence of the officers employed therefor.

(2) Tramways, warehouse, sheds, engines and other appliances for conveying, receiving and storing goods landed or to be shipped, or carried, and accommodation for the sampling and selling of such goods. Such tramways, with the previous sanction of the Local Government, to be worked by locomotive engines or other motive power, drawing or propelling carriages and wagons, for the conveyance of goods therein.

(3) Laying down moorings for carrying out the purposes of this Act; and the erection of cranes, scales, and all other necessary means and appliances, for loading and unloading vessels.

(4) Reclaiming, enclosing and raising any part of the river bank or the river bed within the port, which may be necessary for the execution of the works authorised by this Act, or otherwise for the purposes of this Act.

(5) The construction and application of dredges and other machines for cleaning, deepening and improving the river bed within the port.

(6) The building of steam-vessels required for the purpose of towing vessels in the port.

(7) The construction of such works, without the limits of the port, as shall be necessary for the protection of works executed under this Act; and all such other works and appliances as may, in the opinion of the Commissioners in meeting, be necessary for carrying out the purposes of this Act."

Government, however, does not absolutely resign itself to the Port Commissioners for the improvement or maintenance of the Port. As in the Calcutta Municipal Act, it reserves to itself the power of enforcing the works it thinks necessary. Thus

"If, at any time, it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Local Government that the works intended to be accomplished under this Act have not been, and are not likely to be, properly carried out, or (if carried out) have not been, and are not likely to be, properly maintained by the Commissioners, it shall be lawful for the Local Government, by a notification to be published in the Calcutta Gazette, to declare that if, within a period of six months from the date of such notification, the Commissioners fail to take measures to the satisfaction of the Local Government for the carrying out or proper maintenance of the said works, the powers by this Act conferred on the Commissioners will, at the end of such period, be withdrawn and revoked.

By such last-mentioned order, and without the necessity of any conveyance, all immovable and moveable property, all rights of levying and recovering tolls, dues and rates, all benefit of contracts and all rights of suit, which at the time may be vested in the Commissioners under this Act, shall be transferred to, and vested in, Her Majesty; and the rights of all creditors of the Commissioners, under this Act, shall continue as against the Secretary of State for India in Council to the extent of the property so transferred to, and vested in, Her Majesty."

Upon these terms, a question suggests itself. Can the Local Government, under the Act, order new works which the Commissioners do not consider necessary?

Law.

SUPREME COURT,—FEBRUARY 8, 1856.

(Before the full Court.)

In the matter of the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Town of Calcutta, and Denobundo Mullick and Brijobundo Mullick, Executors and Trustees of the last Will and Testament of Bustumdos Mullick, deceased.

In this matter, Mr. Peterson, on behalf of the Executors, had obtained a rule nisi calling upon the above Commissioners to show cause why an inquisition taken by the late Sheriff pursuant to a warrant issued by them should not be quashed.

The Advocate General and Mr. Currie appeared for the Commissioners.

Mr. Peterson and Mr. Doyne in support of the rule.

The Court after hearing the arguments reserved its decision, which was delivered by the Chief Justice as follows.

His Lordship said :—

This is an application by the executors of Bustumdos Mullick, deceased, to quash an inquisition taken by the late Sheriff of Calcutta on the 11th of December last for the purpose of ascertaining the price for compensation to be paid for certain lands belonging to the estate of Bustumdos Mullick and sought to be taken by the Commissioners under the provisions of Acts XII of 1852 and XXII. of 1847. A special jury empanelled according to the directions of the latter Act has assessed the price and compensation at the sum of Co.'s Rs. 31,369, and the Sheriff has adjudged that sum to be paid by the Commissioners.

The inquisition, however, is assailed on three grounds,—1st, that neither the inquisition nor the warrant of the Commissioners which is annexed to it states that the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor to the taking of these lands by the Commissioners had been given, or facts from which by necessary intendment the giving of that consent can be inferred; 2ndly, that no such consent as is contemplated by the Acts in question had in fact been given; and lastly, that no such consent could be regularly given, inasmuch as the Commissioners, in taking these lands for the purpose of dealing as they propose to deal with them, are acting in excess of the powers vested in them by these Acts.

Upon the first question many authorities have been cited, but they are all or nearly all collected in the reports of Taylor vs. Churson in the Exchequer Chamber 2 Q. B. 978; and of the same case in the House of Lords 11 Clarke and Finnely 610. With the exception of certain dicta to which I will presently advert, they all seem to admit that a statutory power to take lands for public purposes, when it is exercised adversely and not by consent, is an authority to be carried into effect by means unknown to the common law; that it must be strictly pursued; and that subject to the following justification those exercising it are subject to the rule which applies to all Courts of inferior and limited jurisdiction, viz., that they must show on the face of the proceedings that they have jurisdiction. The qualification which must be taken to be conclusively established by Taylor vs. Churson is this—that the circumstances which are essential to the existence of the jurisdiction need not be expressly stated on the face of the inquisition; it is sufficient if by fair and necessary intendment they can be inferred either from the Inquisition or the warrant or any other document annexed to and made part of the proceeding. The principal dictum that can be opposed to this view of the law is contained in the observations of Lord Cottenham at page 651 of Clarke and Finnely's Report. But those were not necessary for the decision of the case; and if they are to be understood to import that it is unnecessary that proceedings should show either the circumstances out of which the jurisdiction arises, or facts from which the existence of those circumstances may legitimately be inferred, or that the proceedings need not state or show anything which is not cognizable by the Sheriff and his jury, then Lord Cottenham certainly went beyond Lord Brougham in the same case, and the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber which was under review. But though he certainly intimated a doubt of the correctness of the view taken by Lords Mansfield and Denman in the cases to which he was referring, I do not understand him to have expressly overruled those authorities to which may be added that of Mr. Baron Parke in Doe dem Payne vs. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 6 M. and W. and others. Again in the observations made by Lord Abinger in the course of the argument in Taylor vs. Churson to which Lord Cottenham refers, he expressly guards himself against the inference that he thought the statement of the preliminary matter unnecessary. He says—"I do not, however, state this as shewing conclusively that the preliminary matter ought not to appear on the face of the inquisition." And he ultimately concurred in the judgment of the Court as delivered by Chief Justice Tindal. In truth had either the House of Lords or the Court below intended to affirm broadly that it was unnecessary or improper to state the preliminary matter, the case of Taylor vs. Churson might have been decided on a far shorter and simpler ground than that on which the decision rests.

It remains to notice some of the objections urged on the other side. It is said that if this preliminary matter which the Sheriff and his Jury have no power to try were stated on the face of the inquisition, it would be conclusive; and that the party whose land is taken would be injured rather than benefited by the rule. I do not know that this consequence would justify our dispensing with the rule if it exists; though no doubt it may be used as an argument against the existence of such a rule if otherwise doubtful. But would such a consequence flow from the statement even in the inquisition of this preliminary matter not as matter adjudicated upon by the Sheriff and his Jury; but by way of recital or narration as facts are stated in a caption? All that was decided in Bastin vs. Carrow, 3 B. and C., was that the record of certain proceedings before two Magistrates was conclusive evidence in an action of trespass against three Magistrates. But it appears from Mr Justice Holroyd's judgment, citing the earlier case of Strickland vs. Ward that the principle is that the record of the judgment or the proceeding in the nature of a judgment of an inferior Court is conclusive, until that judgment or proceeding is reversed or quashed. Therefore if it be admitted that in any proceeding on the inquisition stating the preliminary matters, the matters so stated could not be controverted, it does not follow that the truth of those matters could not be inquired into on an application to quash the inquisition. Lord Denman, in the Queen vs. Bolton, 1 Q.B. 66, very clearly distinguishes between the cases on which extensive evidence is receivable to show that the inferior tribunal acted without jurisdiction, and those in which it is not receivable, the test being whether the facts on which the question of jurisdiction or no jurisdiction turns, were those which the tribunal in question had on inquiry regularly commenced to try. Here the argument assumes that the Sheriff and his Jury had no power to try such preliminary matters on the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor or the like. The case of the Queen vs. the Justices of Cheshire, 8 Ad. and Ellis, is one in which affidavits to prove that the Justices acted without jurisdiction were received.

Another point taken by Mr. Advocate-General was that there is a distinction between an inquisition under these acts, and an inquisition under the English Railway Acts, the latter being expressly made a document of title whereas here a further conveyance is necessary. But all the cases turn not on the effect of the inquisition or the title of the party taking the lands; but on the nature of the tribunal before which it is had.

Again, Mr. Advocate-General distinguished between the inquisition under those acts which are returnable into and become quasi records of this Court; and inquisitions which under particular Acts of Parliament are returnable into and become quasi records of the inferior Courts of Quarter Sessions. That circumstance may give us a form of amendment which is not possessed by the superior Courts at home in like cases; but the reason of the rule appears from Taylor vs. Churson and most of the authorities to be the character of the tribunal before which the proceeding is had (the Sheriff and his Jury); not the character of the Court to which the inquisition is returnable. The only authority which so far as I have seen gives any color to the argument is an obiter dictum of Mr. Justice Littledale in the Queen vs. the Masters of Swansea Harbour; and he is there stating the contention of one of the parties rather than expressing an opinion of his own. On the whole, then, I have come not very willingly to the conclusion that upon the authorities the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor, if it be a circumstance necessary to give the Sheriff jurisdiction, ought either to be stated on the form of the proceedings, or be capable of being legitimately inferred from what is there stated.

Then is the existence of such a consent or sanction necessary to give the Sheriff and his Jury jurisdiction? Under the 4th section of Act XII of 1852 the Commissioners have no power to make or alter streets except with the consent of the Governor of Bengal; under the 6th section of the same Act, which is that which perhaps bears most directly on the question, they have no power to take land for any purpose authorized by either that Act or Act X of 1852 except by and with the consent of the Governor of Bengal. The 2d section of Act XXII of 1847 is still stronger, for by that the Commissioners when they think it necessary to purchase lands are to represent the same to the Governor of Bengal, and if he shall consent thereto but not otherwise, are in certain events to apply to the Sheriff to summon a jury. This is one of the provisions which by the 6th section of Act XII of 1852 is incorporated in that Act. It is therefore impossible we think to doubt that in the absence of the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal the warrant of the Commissioners directing the Sheriff to summon a jury would be irregular; and the subsequent proceedings before the Sheriff would be coram non iudice. It is no answer to say that the Sheriff's authority is the warrant of the Commissioners if that consent is irregular; the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor under these Acts seems to be at least as essential to the jurisdiction of the Sheriff as the disagreement of the parties was in the case of Taylor vs. Churson.

Then is the giving of this consent stated on these proceedings, or can it be inferred from what is there stated by necessary intendment? It is said that although not stated in the injunction or in the warrant it was stated in the notice to the parties which is inserted in the warrant, and also though more briefly in the inquisition. But the notice is made no part of the proceedings before the Sheriff; it is not in any way annexed to, or incorporated in the injunction; and the recital of it in either document omits to mention the consent of the Lieutenant-Governor. Then how far from what is stated can the existence of that consent be inferred? In Taylor vs. Churson the fact of the disagreement was legitimately inferred from the act of summoning a jury; for it was irrational to suppose that the parties if agreed would go before a jury. But were you can only infer the consent by supposing that the Commissioners would not act in excess of their authority; in other words by presuming omnia rite acta fuisse, which is just the presumption which in the case of an inferior or extraordinary tribunal the law forbids you to make on a question of jurisdiction. We are therefore reluctantly brought to the conclusion that these proceedings are defective. We should most unwillingly yield to such an objection if we saw that the proceedings had been regular in fact; and that the party who was dissatisfied with the verdict of the former jury was seeking in this way to obtain a new trial. In such a case we should consider whether as the Act makes the injunction a quasi record of our own Court we could not direct it to be amended.

But we are unfortunately unable to satisfy ourselves that in this case there has been in fact such a consent of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to the proceedings of the Commissioners as is contemplated by the Acts. It is admitted that the first letter of the Commissioners and the answer signed by Mr. Hodgson Pratt do not import such a consent. The Commissioners were seeking to do what they were afterwards advised, and as we think correctly advised implied a taking of land for other purposes than those authorized by the Acts; and acting under that advice they treated the consent evidenced by that correspondence as null. We cannot read the letter of the 17th of March as conveying to the Lieutenant-Governor any proposition but the old proposition in a new shape. It states the objection that has been suggested to the taking of lands with the avowed object of selling them at a profit, and admits the sufficiency of that objection. But it proceeds to argue the desirableness of not merely opening up a new and broad thoroughfare; but of building on each side of it houses and shops of superior order arranged with a view to the sanitary condition of the inhabitants; and the consequent necessity of taking a moderate space on either side of the new street. It further states that the quantities of surplus land stated in the previous report are not precisely those which the Commissioners would now demand of a jury; claims the right of the Commissioners to resell or relet for improved houses or compounds only; and comes to this conclusion "The Commissioners have undoubtedly a bona fide intention of taking such portions of land in excess of the actual width of the street for public purposes only either themselves to build upon it, or to resell to others to build such houses or shops only as will add to the appearance and improvement of the Town." But the letter does not show what definite portion of land the Commissioners proposed to take for those purposes. On the contrary, though the passage already stated implied that they required less than that indicated by their June letter and this letter ends by "soliciting the sanction of His Honor to the Commissioners abiding by their requisition for the larger quantities of land as advised by Mr. Thomas being in reality required for the public improvement of the Town in connection with the new proposed street," Mr. Thomas' letter is not set out in the affidavit, but I entirely understand this letter of the Commissioners as asking the sanction of Government to the taking of all the land specified in the former application if they should see fit; although all was not required for the purposes contemplated.

I am confirmed in this view by the answer to the proposal which was conveyed in the letter signed by Mr. Russell as Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal which limits the outlay to be made by the Commissioners to the precise sum previously sanctioned, viz. Rs. 1,08,298.

It is true that Mr. Rowe swore that before the Commissioners sent their second letter to the Government of Bengal he had prepared for them the plan annexed to his affidavit and marked C, shewing that what was required was 50 feet on either side of the road. But it is not stated that that plan was submitted to Government, and the correspondence leads us to the contrary conclusion. It is impossible to conceive a more general consent than is given in the letter signed by Mr. Russell.

The only limits imposed on the discretion of the Commissioners are that the land taken shall be necessary for the general sanitary improvements contemplated in connection with the new thoroughfare; and that their expenses shall not exceed the former estimation of Rs. 1,08,298.

Now it appears to us that when the Legislature made the consent of the Governor of Bengal a condition precedent to the taking of land by the Commissioners it intended not only to check the expenditure of the Commissioners, but to protect the proprietors of land against any arbitrary exercise of the powers vested in the Commissioners. It follows we think that whenever the Commissioners do take land under these Acts they ought to submit a proposal definite as to the quantity and locality of the land to be taken, and as to the purpose for which it is taken; and to obtain the sanction of Government to that definite proposal. We cannot say that that course has been here pursued. No doubt it may often happen that either from the impossibility of estimating precisely the quantity required, or from the necessity of taking some land in order to carry on the operations by which the permanent work is to be effected, more may be taken than is ultimately used for the purpose contemplated, so that no valid objection could be raised. But here the Commissioners seem to have asked for and obtained a consent which conveys more land than that which they admit they require and thus to have obtained a discretion which the Legislature never intended to give them.

It may be premature to give a decided opinion on the question which the Advocate General and Mr. Cowie have hardly had an opportunity of fully arguing. But we cannot refrain from intimating the very grave doubts which we entertain whether the purpose announced by the Commissioners even in the second letter is one of the purposes authorized by the Act. It is perhaps difficult to limit the power to build streets given by the 4th section, as the learned Counsel for the Mullicks would have us limit it to the making of the thoroughfare and its appendages as drains or the like. The words "to build a street" certainly seem to imply the right to build the lines of houses on either side of the road which with the road constitute what in common parlance is called "the street." But if this were intended one should have expected the Legislature to have imposed some limit as to the nature of the buildings to be erected on either side, and the quantity of ground to be taken on either side for that purpose. It cannot have intended to authorize the construction on the land of others of a line of palaces yielding a profit. And it is not easy to see where the line which is to limit their operations is to be drawn. But even if the power given to the Commissioners is taken in its largest sense, they and they only are authorised to build streets. They are not authorised to take land for the purpose of letting it on building leases; or to speculate in the sale of it to other persons for building purposes according to their plans. Yet some such operations as these are contemplated even in their second communication to Government, and the distinction is important because, as was well observed by I think Mr. Doyne, the power of the Commissioners in building for themselves are limited by the funds at their disposal; whereas they would be increased to an extent to which it is difficult to assign a limit if they were thus permitted to work through others and to speculate in land.

Upon the whole, then, we are of opinion that the formal objection taken to these proceedings is valid; and that as we are not satisfied either that a sufficient consent of the Lieutenant Governor was obtained in fact; or that the purpose contemplated by the Commissioners is one authorised by the Act, we cannot exercise in this case such power as we may have to amend the record. We are most unwilling to throw obstacles in the way of anything which tends to the sanitary improvement of this city which is so much in need of it. The plan proposed may be an excellent one. If not within the powers now possessed by the Commissioners it may be one which might be fitly authorized by a special Act of the Legislature. But if that were done, new conditions in aid and protection of the proprietors of land might possibly be imposed. We must not allow a desire for improvement to interfere with the duty which is cast upon us of protecting the rights of property, by confining those who are intrusted with extraordinary powers over the property of others within the strict limits of their authority. The inquisition must be quashed.

Rule Absolute.

THE

LOAN NOTIFICATION.

1. The Commissioners of Calcutta are prepared, with the sanction of the Governor-General in Council, given under Section 404 of Act II. (B. C.) of 1888, to open a Debenture Loan for Rs. 20,00,000 on the security of the rates, taxes and dues imposed and levied under the Calcutta Municipal Consolidation Act 1888.
2. The Debentures will have a currency of thirty years from the 1st October 1890, and will bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, payable on the 1st April and 1st October of each year.
3. The form of Debenture-bonds will be that given in the twelfth schedule of Act II. (B. C.) of 1888.
4. No Debentures will be issued for any sum less than Rs. 500, and above that amount Debentures will be issued only for even sums of Rs. 100.
5. Tenders for the whole or any part of the above loan will be received by the Secretary to the Corporation up to 2 o'clock P. M. of Thursday, the 19th June 1890.
6. Each tender must be made out in the form annexed to this Notification and enclosed in a sealed cover addressed to the Secretary to the Corporation, and superscribed "Tender for Municipal Loan of 1890-91."
7. Each tender must be accompanied by Government Promissory Notes, Currency Notes or Cheques for not less than 3 per cent. of the amount tendered.
8. When a tender is accepted the deposit, when made in currency notes or cheques, will be held as a payment in part of the amount tendered, and will bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the 19th June 1890, provided that the whole amount tendered is paid up in the manner hereinafter prescribed, but no debenture will be issued for the sum so deposited so long as the entire amount of the tender is not paid.

9. The deposits or tenders which may not be accepted, will be returned on application, and no interest will be payable on such deposits. If an allotment after being made is not taken up and the full amount allotted is not paid as hereinafter prescribed, the deposit will be forfeited.

10. The rate at which a tender is made, must be specified in rupees, or rupees and annas: a tender in which the rate is not so specified, will be rejected as null and void.

11. The rates stated in a tender must not contain any fraction of an anna. If a rate containing a fraction of an anna is inserted in any tender, such fraction will be struck out, and the tender treated as if the rate did not contain such fraction of an anna.

12. The amount of the accepted tenders must be paid into the Bank of Bengal in the following instalments:—

One third on 19th July 1890, one-third on 19th August 1890 and one-third on 19th September 1890.

Parties whose tenders are accepted will have the option of paying all or any of the instalments before the dates specified above, and will receive interest from the date of such payment.

13. Anticipation interest will be paid on all instalments from the respective dates on which such instalments are paid into the Bank of Bengal to the 30th September 1890.

14. In the case of two or more tenders at the same rate a pro rata allotment will be made (if the tenders are accepted), but no allotment will be issued if the amount distributable on any tender is less than Rs. 500.

15. A minimum having been previously fixed, tenders will then be opened by the Loan Committee of the Commissioners at 2.30 P.M., on Thursday, the 19th June 1890, at the Municipal Office.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News, October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes." But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

I WOULD NOT HAVE THEE YOUNG AGAIN.

I would not have thee young again,
Since I myself am old ;
Not that thy youth was ever vain,
Or that my age is cold ;
• But when upon thy gentle face
• I see the shades of time,
• A thousand memories replace
The beauties of thy prime.

Though from thine eyes of softest blue
Some light hath passed away,
Love looketh forth as waim and true
As on our bridal day.
I hear thy song, and though in part
'Tis fainter in its tone,
I heed it not, for still thy heart
Seems singing to my own.

RAIN ON THE ROOF.

When the humid showers gather
Over all the starry spheres,
• And the melancholy darkness
• Gently weeps in rainy tears,
'T is a joy to press the pillow
Of a cottage chamber bed,
And to listen to the patter
Of the soft rain overhead.

Every tinkle on the shingles
Has an echo in the heart,
• And a thousand dreary fancies
• Into busy being start ;
• And a thousand recollections
Weave their bright hues into woof,
As I listen to the patter
Of the soft rain on the roof.

• There in fancy comes my mother,
• As she used to years ago,
To survey the infant sleepers
Ere she left them till the dawn.
I can see her bending o'er me,
As I listen to the strain
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.

Then my little seraph sister,
With her wings and waving hair,
And her bright-eyed cherub brother,
As serene angelic pair,

Glide around my wakeful pillow
With their praise or mild reproof,
As I listen to the murmur
Of the soft rain on the roof.

• And another comes to thrill me
• With her eyes' delicious blue ;
I forget, as gazing on her,
That her heart was all untrue ;
I remember that I loved her
As I ne'er may love again,
• And my heart's quick pulses vibrate
• To the patter of the rain.

There is nought in art's bravuras
That can work with such a spell,
In the spirit's pure, deep fountains,
Whence the holy passions swell,
As that melody of nature—
That subdued, subduing strain,
Which is played upon the shingles
By the patter of the rain.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THERE will be an annular eclipse of the sun on June 17, in the afternoon. Calcutta will miss the astronomical tamasha. The ring will not be visible here.

THE advice of Sir Morell Mackenzie to singers is—Avoid tobacco, alcohol and fiery condiments. Hot spices and specially spirits have immediately a clearing and strengthening effect on the voice and the breath. Probably their long continued use is hurtful. Tobacco, however, is not understood in India to do any harm. Opium-smoking seems somehow prejudicial, though the drug itself is a powerful subduer of phlegm. But there is a decidedly injurious practice much in vogue among our singers—the Hashish.

IN favour of the fragrant weed—

Bacchus' black servant, Negro fine—

it has been remarked that in Switzerland, not a single person employed in any of the cigar and tobacco manufactories was attacked by influenza, while around them it was raging high.

A LONDON society paper tells an anecdote of a young man, not a hundred degrees removed from succession to the throne. He was taking part in one of those mild intellectual games that drawing-room misses dearly love, and being asked to write down the name of some heroine in history, was at a loss. A young lady near him came to his rescue. She prompted him, suggesting Jeanne d'Arc. The name was written and handed in. It was written "Jane Dark."

This carries us back to the times of the earliest Princes in England of the dynasty. At this day, it is a worse libel on Royalty than the Examiner's on the "Adonis of fifty."

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

THE Viceroy has permitted Sir Steuart Bayley to appoint Mr. H. J. S. Cotton a member of the Bengal Legislative Council in place of Mr. F. B. Peacock, retired. When will the Hon'ble Cotton have the C.I.E. and the C.S.I. of the gentlemen whom he has now replaced in the Secretariat and the Council? He is a man of undoubted ability and energy, and if he flirted with the genius of the pave it was time for him to recover caste by jilting her before she definitely discovers him to be fat and passed forty. Be that as it may, we welcome him as a distinct accession to the strength of the local Council. The death of Mr. Macaulay left the chamber visibly weak. Except Sir Henry Harrison, we do not know the officer who can fill the vacancy better than Mr. Cotton. If Sir Henry is a veteran and unrivalled in debate, Mr. Cotton is far from a bad speaker and he will soon come up to the mark.

By a fresh order dated Simla, the 29th May 1890, the Hon'ble F. M. Halliday of the Board of Revenue, Lower Provinces, is restricted to the exercise of the duties, powers and authority in the Department of Land Revenue. That includes revenue, survey and settlement, land registration, land improvements, the sale or lease of waste land and Government estates, the management of wards and attached estates, the collection of cesses, the realization of arrears of revenue, and the recovery of public demands, rent suits, embankments, pensions, the examination, enrolment, &c., of revenue agents, putni sales, and the supply of provisions for troops. Sir Henry Harrison has, with retrospective effect from the 15th April 1890, charge of the Departments of Miscellaneous Revenue, including excise, assessed taxes, salt, opium, customs, stamps and stationery, tolls and canals, the partition of estates, and the acquisition of land for public purposes. Could not the order be made when Sir Henry took charge?

THE order for exchange of services between Mr. M. Macauliffe of the Punjab and Mr. F. J. G. Campbell of Bengal has been cancelled.

LIEUTENANT S. H. Pollen, Wiltshire Regiment, has been added as an Extra Aid-de-Camp to the Viceroy's Personal Staff.

THE Deccan Times learns on what it calls reliable authority that Sir Steuart Bayley intends taking six months' leave preparatory to retirement.

THE historical painter who painted "A Scene at the Massacre of St. Bartholomew," Mr. Robert Fleury, ex-Director of the Ecole des Beaux Arts, is dead. He died at the age of 94, at the Villa de Medici, at Rome.

THE May number of Blackwood contains a good Indian article by a rising member of the Bengal Civil Service, Mr. H. H. Risley. His subject is Sikkim. According to him, the struggle of races and creeds there will gradually end in that little Himalayan State being completely Nepalised. He contemplates the prospect with pleasure, as it means ascendancy of Hinduism and the extinction of Thibetian influence. Already, the influx of Nepalese threatens the Thibetian interest. As matters stand, we believe Mr. Risley is quite right. But he makes no allowance for possibilities. A strong personality on any side may change the circumstances and, of course, falsify all calculations.

DURING the past year, about twenty thousand persons, representing thirty-nine nationalities, paid for admission to Shakespeare's house in Stratford-on-Avon.

THE editor of a vernacular newspaper printed in Meerut—Jaiwa-i-Ezdi—has been fined rupees ten, under section 292, I. P. C., for publishing an advertisement for the sale of aphrodisiacs in obscene terms.

ON May 31, Mr. Luximonrao Jagannathjee Vaidya made over and Dewan Bahadur Manbhai Jushbai assumed charge as Dewan of Baroda. The same afternoon Jagannathjee left Baroda on a visit to the Gaekwad at Umrat.

THE Collector of Moorshedabad assessed a Prem Chand Roy Chand scholar for the income tax for the scholarship he draws. The scholar thought it hard and appealed to the Presidency Commissioner. Mr.

Smith looked differently on the matter and has decided against the Collector.

THE People's Friend of Madras has information that "Retention in the service until the 31st March 1891" has been sanctioned in reference to the lowing officers who have attained the age of 55 years or who will attain that age during the year 1890-91."

So

The lowing herd winds slowly o'er the lea, to the end of the administrative chapter.

What is the composition of the herd? Our contemporary does not keep us long in the dark, but immediately mentions by name seven of the members. Thus

"(1) M. R. Ry. P. T. Rajagopala Chariar Avergal, General Charge Deputy Collector (of whom it is remarked 'efficient, and may be retained until the end of the next official year.') (2) M. R. Ry. T. Pattabiram Pillai Avergal, General Charge Deputy Collector, (is a strong man, fit for several years' further service). (3) M. R. Ry. T. Rajaram Rao, Dewan Bahadur, Treasury Deputy Collector (is mentally and physically fit for further service and may be retained until his sixtieth year). (4) M. R. Ry. M. Suriyamurthi Pillai Avergal, Treasury Deputy Collector (strongly recommends this officer's retention for another year). (5) Mr. E. G. Ricketts, Treasury Deputy Collector (fit for further service). (6) Mr. W. E. Underwood, General Charge Deputy Collector (physically fit for further service. This officer has served for 23 years in the Wynad, and ought to be transferred to some post on the plains). (7) T. Mahomed Ali Khan, Sahib Bahadur, Assistant Conservator of Forests (has had little opportunity of judging his fitness for work, but sees no objection to his being retained for another year. The Conservator says that Mahomed Ali Khan Sahib is perfectly efficient and may be allowed one more year of service.)"

"LOWING officers" may not perhaps be a very complimentary term for Civilians whether of the genus Covenanted or the genus Uncovenanted, but it is withal a capital designation. The Universities in India have of late commanded the attention of its examinees to the differences between the speech and eloquence of the lowing herds of India and England. Mr. Justice Norris presiding at the reading of Mr. A. Chaudhuri's paper, in which a question to that effect at one of the Calcutta University examinations was brought to notice, with blunt truth called the author of the question an ass. Mr. Norris is given to saying memorable things, but he never said anything more true or to the point. The ass happened to be present and could not help betraying himself. He was the Simon Pure, hailing from Bæotia, he brayed.

An ass his feelings has.

And the feelings of this ass, alas!

Were wounded.

He said, tossing his head,

(And the scorn his speech betray'd, loud bray'd, Resounded)

"Hee! haw!

Lighter than straw

On the wind, fools run

After what glitters. The taste of the day!

Sound worth they shun,

Their praises give to the sun's display,

And to me give none.

Ungrateful and frivolous fools, I say!

For, if I were the sun, they would flatter me, they

Who all fly me now. Yet, if I were the sun,

What could I do for them more, I pray,

Than, being an ass, I already have done?

I should simply have nothing to do but to shine—

Shine, or be seen, 'twould be all as one:

And no great merit in that, I opine,

If one happens to be the sun."

Just so. There is no appreciation of originality in this world. He has by force of uncommon genius boldly deviated from the common track. And the reward is—to be the butt of Barrister Baboos and Barrister Judges! What could he do better if he had, like the best of your dons and hidalgos, asked questions of the approved and time-honoured character? He could be only another man in the East. His ambition was greater. He would fill the public ear from the Indus to the Naff. He would inaugurate a new era in University examinations. He was not for imitating the jogtrot sun. Of course, Mr. Justice Norris immediately apologised.

AMIR Ahmed, a wealthy Zemindar in the Bareilly district, has been sentenced by the Judge to one year's simple imprisonment. He was accused of abducting the daughter of Haji Kudrat Ali. The Judge found that at the date of abduction the girl was more than sixteen years of age and that she was carried off by force, and that he married her in proper form afterwards. The marriage did not save the Zemindar, although it mitigated the rigour of punishment for the offence.

THE Assam Volunteer Corps—the Sibsagar Mounted Rifles, the Lakhimpur Mounted Rifles, the Nowgong Mounted Rifles, the Shillong Volunteer Rifle Corps and the Gauhati Rifles—have been ordered to be formed into an Administrative Battalion under the name of the “Assam Valley Administrative Battalion,” and to be under the orders of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief in India. This is an important measure for the defence of not only the frontier Province but of East Bengal too.

THE man who was arrested as the dacoit Harpal is no dacoit at all, but one Mahomed Ali Khan of Meerut, a landlord's agent. He was taken to the Tahsildar to have his statement recorded. But he had been to the Tahsildar the day before—to pay revenue, and produced his receipt for the same. The Tahsildar recognized the man, and he was discharged. We may sympathise with the Police discomfitted and disappointed for the moment in their cherished hope of reward on the dacoit's head, but we rejoice that an innocent man has escaped the gallows.

TWO more results of the Calcutta University examinations are out this week—the F. A. and the F. E. In the First Arts, 27 students have passed in the first division, 183 in the second, and 879 in the third, making a total of 1089. In the Engineering, the numbers are 2 in the first and 8 in the second division.

IN Servia, they have passed a Bill granting monopoly to an Anglo-German syndicate to work the rich paraffin and petroleum fields in Servia.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Silver question is still under discussion in the American Senate. Public opinion still wavers. At one time the feeling was strong for free coinage. The indication now is on the other way. On the 5th instant, Senator Sherman opposed free coinage of silver, for that, he said, would demonetize gold and make silver the only standard. A compromise has been suggested providing for the purchase of four and-a-half million dollars of silver bullion monthly, making tantamount notes legal, rendering private and public debts redeemable in silver bullion, and allowing free coinage when the ratio of silver to gold reaches sixteen to one. A meeting of the Republican Caucus has approved of this compromise.

A NEW York telegram speaks of a terrific cyclone sweeping over Nebraska on the 4th, carrying destruction throughout the whole district. At Bradshaw several houses have fallen, several hundreds of persons been killed and many more injured.

In Oakland, California, a passenger train in full motion ran through an open drawbridge into the river below. Thirteen passengers are reported to have been drowned and forty injured.

THE House of Commons has rejected by 81 votes the Bill for the Channel Tunnel across the straits of Dover. Government was opposed to the measure, but it had the support of Mr. Gladstone, who, in his old age, is in for almost any innovation that can be styled “Reform.”

The House of Commons would not allow precedence to a discussion on the action of the police in forbidding the procession to Hyde Park on Saturday last to protest against the compensation clauses of the Licensing Bill. A motion for adjournment of the House to enable it to take up that subject was, after a long and hot discussion, lost by a majority of 110 votes.

Sir James Fergusson denied in the Lower House any surrender to Germany of British territory in Africa.

The question to which it was a reply, was evidently suggested by a speech of Mr. Stanley's, the present lion of London society, at a banquet at the Fishmongers' Hall, in which he inveighed against the abandonment by Great Britain of her commerce in East Africa in favour of Germany.

Funds are being raised in London for a steamer on the Victoria Nyanza. On the 5th, there was a crowded meeting at the Mansion House. Mr. Stanley was present of course and spoke. The Duke of Fife presided. In the course of his address he said that England would not be outstripped in Africa by the zeal of her rivals. Which is mere opinion.

THE Bulgarian Government has decided to address England, Italy and Austria for recognition of Prince Ferdinand.

On the 27th May, the Prince escaped a narrow capture by an armed band who waited at Bellova while he was travelling by rail. Fortunately, the plot got wind, and the anti-Russian Premier M. Stambuloff hearing of it managed to frustrate the design.

Prince Bismarck will shortly visit London.

THE First Lord of the Admiralty, speaking at the Academy dinner, pronounced the following remarkable opinion:—

“The modern ship-of-war from year to year more and more resembles a great storehouse of ingenious mechanism and of deadly compounds. If, then, the modern ship-of-war is to be an effective fighting instrument, it is absolutely essential that our naval officers should go through such a course of training as will enable them to use both with confidence and with energy the new weapons which are placed in their hands. It is necessary for us to endeavour to establish such a system of training and education as will give both officers and men adequate knowledge of the duties they are called upon to perform. The one fact which the recent naval manoeuvres have brought to notice is that no general training, however excellent, can compensate for the want of individual knowledge of the ship which has to be managed, of the gun which has to be trained, of the machine which has to be used in time of emergency.”

The Army and Navy Gazette quotes that passage with approval, and devotes a leading article to urge and illustrate the same view. We expect soon the beginning of a thorough change in the system of manning the Navy. Even the common sailor must start with some education, and both men and officers must be under continual training, to be able to work efficiently the complicated or delicate machinery now used on the modern vessels of war. This will, of course, largely increase the cost.

Meanwhile, the Navy is more than ever rising in importance. Rear Admiral Colomb, in the last instalment of his treatise on Naval Warfare appearing in the Illustrated Naval and Military Magazine, holds success in attack to depend upon commanded-sea co-operation between the Army and the Navy, the Navy's first care being to place the Army in position, and then sinking to play a subordinate part in the game.

THE Supreme Government has in right earnest taken up the bric of discipline—not a day too soon. It has called upon the Local Government to explain its conduct in connection with the native farewell entertainment to Mr. Peacock. When Mr. Reynolds was so honored, the Bengal Government was warned that the demonstration was against standing orders. How in the face of order accentuated by warning, Sir Stuart Bayley attended the entertainment at the Town Hall to Mr. Peacock, India has asked. As well it may. But it is easier to ask than to answer. The correspondence between the two Governments is not yet concluded.

THE Indian Penal Code provides for all existing and future offences. During the thirty years that it is being worked on the people of India, the commoner offences have received no end of interpretations at the hands of acute lawyers, experienced Judges and raw Magistrates. But it was reserved for a Civilian Magistrate in Bengal to convict, under that Code, at the instance of the local municipality, the owner of a tree for cutting it down, for theft of the shade the tree while standing afforded to passers-by along the street adjoining! And it was this model magistrate—Mr. Luson—who was sent to troubled Jessore to do justice between the Planters and the people and heal the festering sores of passion and discord!

IN Southern India, they have just formed a native company under the name of the South Indian Steam Navigation Company for small steamer service, for both passenger and traffic, between Kalasegarapatam and Cuddalore. The coast service is already in British hands, and the friends of the new venture seem uneasy at the prospect of hostility from that quarter. Surely, the native pioneers well calculated their chances—their dangers as well as their resources for meeting them—before their start. For the rest, we think it neither policy nor propriety to bespeak indulgence by appeals ad misericordiam as the Native Press in the South is doing. There is no room for tenderness in trade any more than in war. Commerce is indeed a sort of bloodless war in which no quarter is given—a struggle between men to take advantage of one another. Those who intrude into ground already occupied have no right to complain if they are bundled out by lawful means. After the tone that our countrymen have been taught to assume towards Europeans by an indiscreet journalism and an irresponsible oratory, the attitude of submission and solicitation ill becomes them, and cannot, we think, be of much earthly use. Indians can only obtain ridicule by their pains. Men of business are not to be won over by cajolery to spare those who threaten their trade—particularly when the competitors belong to a class which is habitually far from cordial in its attitude. Nor is it necessary for our friends in Madras to resort to these petty extra-business arts. There is doubtless room for another company on the Coromandel. At any rate, the new company may offer special facilities to minor ports and be the instrument of developing business and even opening new centres. Intelligent and energetic Indian men of business can always do wonders in the country commerce which few foreigners can attempt. We hope the new company will pay particular attention to the comfort of passengers and the convenience of shippers.

IN connection with the Agricultural Exhibition to be held in Vienna in the course of this year, it has been proposed to hold as well an International Agricultural Congress during the first days of September next. Before and after the Congress, there will be General Assemblies in which reports will be presented and speeches made, but no debates allowed. At the second general meeting the resolutions passed by the various sections will be published. Two languages—German and French—will be permitted for the debates.

Such is the information published officially for the benefit of Her Majesty's lieges by Government in the official Gazette. This publication, in the manner of it, is well worthy of the Great Indian Circumlocution Office. For any earthly use to the said lieges, the information in question might as well have been hermetically sealed as a secret of state and deposited in the archives for the enlightenment of the future historian. People from India could not well at such short notice attend the Congress at Vienna, still if any one, at great sacrifice, offered himself, he would not be allowed. For, the time fixed in the same notification for such application has expired—long since expired. All this information about the Austrian Agricultural Congress occurs in a letter of the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Consul-General at Bombay to the Secretary to the Government of India in the Foreign Department, which was to be communicated to the different Provincial Administrations with a direction to give the matter publicity. We find the Consul-General writing on the last day of March and allowing only the whole of the next month—April—for persons desiring to attend the Congress to apply to him. It was a matter that obviously required immediate attention, as well in courtesy to a Great Power with which Her Majesty is, and has always been, at peace and on the most cordial terms, as in the interest of the agriculture and commerce of this Empire. At the same time, it was matter requiring no protracted conferences of the highest conclave—no cogitation whatever by a single soul. It was a matter of mere departmental routine, for any junior Secretary to dispose of with a scratch of the quill. In fact, this is the justification for the Consul-General (unless he had just received his despatch from home,) for addressing our Government so late. But our Lotos-eaters dreamed over it in the pleasant heights of Simla. It was not till the middle of May that they awoke. The Government of India circular is dated the 15th May, a fortnight after the expiry of the period—the whole month of April—which intending visitors were allowed for application. For that matter, any energy and promptitude afterwards exhibited or observed by the Local Administrations would have been unavailing—could not have helped the object in the least. Still, under such circumstances, ordinary human nature would in decency, or weakness if you will, rouse itself to a feat of unaccustomed celerity. But the Lotos of irresponsible power is a strong poison which unnerves the motor organs and deadens the faculties, banishes the sense of danger, steels the heart against public opinion, and promotes recklessness. Thus it was not till nineteen days after that the local Gazette published the circular containing the Consul-General's letter inviting Her Majesty's Indian subjects to the Congress.

MR. Charles Marvin, in his last weekly despatch to the Morning Post, gives an account of the haunts and habits in London of our friend Professor Arminius Vambery, of Pesth, now on a visit to England. Simple in his living, rising early though compelled, by the demands of "society" upon him, to go to bed late, without either the untidiness or the absent-mindedness or even the pedantry of the typical German savant of the British popular imagination, without a trace of the Bohemianism which might be supposed to cling to the European who, during his travels, personated to perfection the Eastern Haji in all the lousy dirtiness of that character, the great Pandit and publicist is altogether a nice person in the best sense. Cordial with men, agreeable to ladies, a good raconteur, no wonder he has made himself a general favorite and is flooded with invitations. We are particularly glad to hear that he is in perfect health and the best spirits, ruddy as a young fox-hunter, and seemingly up to any expedition for search of Prester John. At the Junior Travellers' Club dinner at the end of April, he said, "I have never had a day's illness in my life, and, as for nerves, I don't understand what they are." What! Shall we all turn Durwesh and wend our way to Bokhara the Noble? Alas for us! his successful enterprise was possible only to one starting with such a constitution and such health as his. Of course, he has met Stanley and been closeted with him. Does that meeting of the two "powers" augur a new geographical mission to the Dark Continent made clear by the Spekes and Grants, the Bekes and Bakers, the Livingstones and Stanleys? With his command of Arabic, written and spoken, and his perfect familiarity with Islam, in its life as well as history and teachings, the Professor would be just the pioneer for the Islamite and quasi-Islamite tribes in the interior. Mr. Marvin informs us that Mons. Vambery has matured a plan for a new expedition, but whether its destination is Africa or any other quarter, Mr. Marvin is not permitted to say.

TOWARDS the end of 1881, a poor peasant at Vajrakarur, a village in the Bellary district, the site since of the Madras Presidency Diamond Fields Company Limited, picked up a shining stone. It passed to Messrs. Orr and Sons for a song. The original weight of the stone was $67\frac{1}{2}$ carats. The purchasers sent it to England, where it was priced at from £35,000 to £65,000. The difficulty was how to cut it. No one in England was found equal to the operation. At last, it was sent to the famous lapidaries of Amsterdam. There the most experienced cutters were so afraid of the almost certain risk of cutting by "cleaving," that the "grinding" process was preferred to give the stone shape—a process very wasteful to be sure but attended with much diminished risk of breakage. This grinding was continued for many months, before the stone was brought to the present perfect form. But now a slight flaw was discerned, near the surface apparently. Grave consultations were once more held, till under a consensus of opinion it was decided to remove the flaw, even at sacrifice of weight. The cutting was successfully completed. Though reduced in weight from $67\frac{1}{2}$ to $24\frac{7}{16}$ carats, it is now at the head of gems, the purest, the most brilliant, and altogether most perfect diamond in the whole world. About two years ago, it came out to India but had to be sent back to London, whence advice came of its sale for £10,900. The speculator who made the purchase, failing to pay on due date, the matter went to court, and after a year's litigation through all the stages, the plaintiff won £3,450 by way of damages and costs. It was now time to dispose of the gem. It came a second time back to India and to Madras, to the famous jewellers and gem merchants, Messrs. Orr & Sons, from whom His Highness the Nizam has just purchased this unique gem for Rs. 1,65,000. It is worthy of the leading Indian Prince. It is called the Gordon Orr Diamond. Messrs. Orr & Sons have, at His Highness' order, set it in a headpiece.

AT Quetta, the other day, in the Court of lowest civil jurisdiction, at the trial of the suit of one Hyder Ali vs. Charles for Rs. 19 for board, witnesses deposed to the defendant having paid but neglected to take receipt. The plaintiff still persisting in his demand, the defendant offered to pay if the plaintiff would on the head of his child swear to his claim. Thereupon Hyder Ali swore accordingly, and the Munsiff decreed the amount.

This is reported even in the native papers as a curious incident. But the challenge to swear which is regarded so odd is really in conformity with the customs of the land; in fact, it is quite a common thing in the country, and is occasionally heard of even in British Courts. Even at this day, disputes are settled by challenge to take oath at the feet of a Brahman or on the head of the swearer's son, or with the Koran in hand. And, where there is no son, or the sacred volume is not at hand, the swearer has to invoke on his own head the vengeance of Heaven in specific form, in the event of his swearing false. Such is the force of habit and such the belief in the truth-compelling powers of the oath that, afraid of the worry and trouble and cost of litigation or impatient of the law's delay, suitors not unfrequently offer to abide by the result of solemn or imprecatory oaths taken by their opponents. It is a pity that the British judicature discourages the practice. In fact, the oath has been virtually abolished.

THE Hon'ble Syud Ameer Hossein has applied for leave. When he is away, it is probable Moulvi Abdool Jubber Khan Bahadr will officiate as Magistrate of the Northern Division of the town.

A CORRESPONDENCE is going on in the Statesman on an old custom of the Hindus of Bengal. We subjoin some interesting remarks from the letters of a well-informed writer hailing from, and indeed signing himself, "Presidency College":—

"You correspondent 'K.S.M.' is mistaken when he says the cactus plant helps to draw the electric fluid into the house. The electric fluid will be drawn into the house by the attraction of the electricity in the cloud above, whether there be a cactus plant or not. The cactus plant only serves to scatter the electricity of the house into space and thereby to neutralise that of the clouds; for these two electricities are of opposite kinds. Placing a cactus plant on the roof may or may not be a Hindoo custom, but our ladies insist on having it on the roof. The Bengalee name of the plant used on the roof is bājbarān, i.e., a preventive of lightning. This conclusively proves that the Hindoos are acquainted with the useful property of this sort of plants. It is not at all improbable that the ancient Hindoos who displayed so much learning in other matters should have been acquainted with the principles of electricity; the explanation is now lost but the custom remains. Or it may be that they found out this property by experience without knowing the explanation, which is now due to the Americans. The reasons given in the Encyclopædia Dictionary are simply absurd and meaningless. To think that the Hindoos seriously believe that because the cactus protects their grounds from stray cows and goats, it will also similarly protect their houses from lightning, is too absurd."

Is this Encyclopædia Dictionary the same as Hunter's? If not, then we have not seen it, and care not to make the acquaintance of a book for teaching language with an ungrammatical title. And Presidency College and other students and teachers of whatever seminary had better be warned against it and its fellows. Not on account of the queer name only. These European lexicons and books of reference are not simply misleading on matters Eastern, but revel in the grossest absurdities and most ludicrous blunders. A man who knows may turn up almost any page to convince himself of the truth of our remark. "Presidency College" in the course of the same controversy says:—

"Your correspondent says that the cactus is exotic and bases his argument on this fact. But there are two or three kinds of similar other plants which are not exotic and are used for the same purpose."

Again:—

"The custom of placing a cactus plant on the roof is based on a highly scientific principle, viz., that of the power of points. Electricity escapes far more easily through a pointed conductor than through a round one. For this reason the end of the brass conductors in an electric machine are mounted with brass knobs. The principle of saving a house from lightning with a metallic pointed conductor and with a prickly cactus plant is the same. When a cloud highly charged with electricity passes over a house, the house becomes charged with electricity of an opposite kind through induction, and these two electricities attract each other. Lightning is only the result of this mutual attraction, when a portion of the electricity of the cloud attracted by that of the earth below strikes the house. But if the house is provided with something having points, the electricity of the earth escapes into the air through these points and neutralises the electricity of the cloud, and thus the discharge cannot take place. Every one knows that the cactus plant has hundreds of sharp pointed prickles. The more the number of points a conductor charged with electricity has, the more easily the electrical fluid escapes from it. Therefore in this respect the cactus plant is far better than an ordinary conductor which has only one point. Now-a-days the conductor of a house is provided with four or five points, and I have seen with satisfaction that the good Fathers of St. Xavier's College have adopted conductors of the above description. The great drawback in the use of the cactus plant is that it cannot have proper connection with the earth: the connection is chiefly through bad conductors. But still something is better than nothing. I would therefore advise every one who cannot afford to pay for a metallic conductor, to have two or three cactus or similar prickly plants in pots placed in the corners of the roof of the house."

There is no doubt about the custom in Bengal or its object. Whether the object is fulfilled is open to question. The matter is important enough to merit proper inquiry. We have not observed the custom in Upper India, but any one who has had peeps into the arcana of the Hindu home in Bengal must have repeatedly seen a plant in a tub placed on the house-top, in a corner, and always the same plant—at least in these parts. The most casual query would have elicited the fact that the plant was neither for worship nor medicine, though it is both sacred and medicinal, but as a protection from lightning. The modus operandi of the botanical lightning protector is beyond the people. Men like "Presidency College" may, with their European science, suggest explanations more or less plausible—the Bengalis in general only follow an old custom. Seeing how different substances are more or less powerful conductors or non-conductors, it is not improbable that this plant has a powerful relation to the electric current and that the old Hindus in the course of observation found this out. They found out the attraction of the thunder-bolt to certain metals, and to this day men and women make haste to remove metallic ware from exposure to a cloudy sky. It is thus that the plant is in use as the domestic remedy against lightning. It is time, however, to test the electric affinities of this plant.

There seems from this correspondence a doubt or confusion about the identity of the plant. Both writers call it cactus, though they are at loggerheads about the species. Nor is this matter for surprise, considering that the botanists themselves are not quite agreed on the subject. The plant that is put up on our housetops is not the Indian cactus so suggestive of the hooded serpent and appropriately called Nagphani in Bengal and Nagkuli on the Coromandel coast. That plant, though common enough, is neither sacred nor, so far as we know, used as a medicine against snakes in this Province. The plant prized as a protection from lightning is the Tekdtā sij. It is not a cactus but a Euphorbia. We do not remember the plant so used called bājbarān. It must be the name in the district from which "Presidency College" hails. Where is it?

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 7, 1890.

THE INCOME TAX ON FOREIGN CONSIGNMENTS.

THE intention of the Government of India to impose Income tax on foreign consignments has naturally been received with prompt opposition by the mercantile community. The memorial of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce against the threatened impost is a strongly worded and argued document. The Chamber has made out a good case against the orders of the Government, and the Government had better pause in carrying them out. The cry of the independent European community is not to be suppressed as that of miserable Baboos.

Indeed, it is a strange and unlooked-for development of a hateful tax. While public hope has been looking forward to the Income tax being gradually shorn of its most oppressive features, towards its ultimate abolition altogether, the determination to widen its sphere gives a painful shock to the mind. It comes to us all as a surprise. It is scarcely an indication of a will on the part of the Government to do away with, at any rate, the more objectionable features of the tax. The Chamber has therefore done well in protesting against the tax on consignments to grapple with the whole question of the retention of the tax at all. The country should be grateful to the mercantile community for its attitude towards the question. The Chamber concludes its memorial in words which will be cordially endorsed by the whole of the tax-paying community. Those words are :—

"The existing Income Tax levied under Act II. of 1886, was, Your Memorialists would point out, a special call upon the country, and was met and accepted as such a special call, and ought now to be removed. With a surplus of two and three quarter crores of rupees and with the finances in a sound and healthy condition, the Government is in a position to recognise the loyal and patriotic efforts made in 1886, so cheerfully, at the call of Your Excellency's illustrious predecessor, the Marquess of Dufferin. In winding up the debate upon the measure, which took place on the 11th January 1886, His Lordship admitted that it was 'a measure which the Government have introduced with a considerable amount of anxiety and reluctance.' His Excellency at the same time accepted the support accorded to Government on that occasion as—

'A better proof and test than any that could be produced of the solidarity of the interests which unite Her Majesty's Native and British subjects in one common feeling of loyalty towards Her Majesty's person and Her Empire.'

Your Memorialists would therefore most humbly solicit Your Excellency—

That the orders of October last directing the levy of Income Tax on profits made on consignments of goods to India by persons resident out of India, may be withdrawn in conformity with the similar decision arrived at by Government so far back as 1863.

And that having regard to the following facts,—that Act II. of 1886 represented a special necessity of the State, that the condition of the finances now is not only favourable but encouraging, and that the accumulated experience of thirty years has not removed a single objection to the Income Tax, but has, on the other hand, confirmed its unsuitability to the character and circumstances of the people of this country, an assurance be given to the public that the whole subject of the continuance of the Income Tax shall be taken into consideration."

Into the Chamber's arguments on the particular question of the assessment of consignments, we need not enter at large. The idea of such an assessment is by no means a new one. So far back as 1863, it was fully considered, and deliberately given up. The Local Governments, with the exception of Madras, are generally more or less opposed to the present decision of the Government of India. As has been clearly shown by the Chamber of Commerce, the appraisement of the profits on consignments to India is a hard and wellnigh impracticable task. It was in view of this fact, which is admitted even by the Government of India, that it has so long been deemed inexpedient to extend the Income tax to this branch of mercantile business. The Bengal Board of Revenue is still of this opinion, and the Government of Bengal agrees with the Board. The Government of Bombay is also of this view. It is only the Government of Madras that supports the proposal of the Supreme Government. The decision of the Government of India was counter to almost a consensus of official opinion. The mercantile community concerned are up in arms. How, under the circumstances, it will be worked in practice may easily be imagined.

The practical difficulties of the measure are fully set forth in the Chamber's memorial. Those difficulties are almost of an insuperable character. At any rate, they have hitherto been held by previous Governments to be such as to deter them from the step. It is true the present measure is adopted as a trial, but the past history of the subject affords small grounds of hope that the trial will be a successful one. It is especially inexpedient to invest Income tax Collectors with summary powers in a case of this kind. We know too well how they stretch their authority even in plain cases where it should not be stretched. Their one subject is to swell the revenue by any means they can. How they will proceed when they are armed with the express orders of Government to make summary assessments where consignors fail for any cause to submit the necessary return of the profits, makes one shudder to contemplate. The failure to ascertain such profits may be often no fault of the consignees. The following facts urged by the Chamber in its memorial will show this :

"Your Memorialists would respectfully confess themselves unable to comprehend upon what grounds merchants in foreign countries could possibly be expected to disclose the results of their business to collectors of Indian Income Tax, and they would ask to be allowed to point to the inevitable friction, irritation and discontent which must wait upon any attempt to levy an Income Tax on profits on consignments. There will naturally be the greatest possible objection on the part of consignors to disclose to their consignees the profits they make on their consignments. Such a system, supposing it could be followed, would upset all business arrangements and confidence and would be most mischievous in its results.

That assuming for instance a consignor had hit on an article of export the sale of which in India left him a profit of 25%, to disclose this to his consignee, to his consignee's office, to the tax collector and his office could not fail to have the effect of flooding the Indian market with the article and completely spoiling the consignor's business. On the other hand it may be said that the consignor may, if he choose, leave his profit to be assessed by the Income Tax collector, in which case it will be assessed at something like 10% of the gross proceeds, but this again will lead to trouble inasmuch as consignors may only declare their profits when they are under 10%, so that he who is making only 10% profit will be subjected to the same tax as he who is making 25%. In the same way a dishonest consignor may return his profit at 2½%, while it may be actually ten times that figure, and an honest man will be obliged to declare his real profits and will thus be handicapped by his dishonest neighbour. The proposal to tax profits made on consignments will, in the opinion of Your Memorialists, be nothing short of placing a premium on dishonesty.

Then again the amount of trouble and correspondence which is bound to follow a proper working of the rule will be so great that Your Memorialists feel sure it cannot have been realised when the Government of India decided to introduce the rule. In many cases consignments made to this country are sold not only without profit but at an actual loss to the consignor, and, in such cases, while no profit is returned to the tax collector, Your Memorialists well know from their past experience of the inquisitorial system which is in force in the collector's office, that such statements will only be accepted when proofs of their correctness are produced, and as these proofs can only be given by the production of the consignors' books possibly in Chinese, Persian, Swahili, Arabic, French, German, Portuguese, Italian, Japanese or English, it will only be possible to produce the necessary proofs at the expenditure of a great amount of time and labour. In fact consignees in this country as well as the tax collectors will require large augmentations to their establishments (including interpreters) to cope with the additional work which will be thrown upon them by the rule under reference, if it is to be properly carried out.

In very many cases indeed Your Memorialists fail to see how consignees or consignors are to be able to state properly the profits made on individual consignments by consignors. Consignors are in many cases manufacturers of the articles which they consign, and the profit or loss made on their Indian consignments is merged in their general business and cannot be kept distinct."

The Government of India may justify the imposition on abstract grounds. The measure is also in harmony with English practice. It is likewise urged that the extent of the trade in goods consigned to India has materially increased since 1863 and that the revenue lost by its exemption from taxation is considerable. Nevertheless, the attempt is doomed or to be a failure on account of the many peculiar difficulties of ascertaining the profits.

APOLOGIA PRO VITA SUA.

THOSE who have done us the honor of reading Reis and Rayyet for any length of time, could not have failed to observe the impartiality and general moderation that characterise this journal—our habitual solicitude for fairplay and truth without fear or favour—how we endeavour to hold the balance even between Europeans and natives, governors and the governed. The days of the Ilbert Bill agitation were an exceptional time—a period of madness. Even then, ready to give as we received, we exercised no little forbearance. We have unimpeachable European testimony to this—a military officer high in the service of the state who knows that we postponed answering an outrage on us for more than a week and then penned our answer and set it up in print, but before publishing it we thought it proper to send it to this gentleman—with whom we stood on terms of brotherly intimacy—for his independent judgment. The result was that Reis and Rayyet was the only paper in the native press in which the notorious "Che Chaw Chum" received no particular answer. Still it was a time of mutual exacerbation in which bitter things were said on both sides. We have at any rate made ample amends thereafter. We have endeavoured to heal wounds and to cause a better understanding between the two races, preaching conciliation in private and exhibiting the example thereof in public. On the Rent Bill though, from long previous study of old literature and papers, leaning on the historic side of the controversy to Zemindari pretensions, we kept ourself free from the temptations to be a partizan of the landlordly propaganda to which so many submitted. We have interpreted between the people and their rulers with fidelity, sparing neither the one nor the other. We are not among the Haranguers of the throng

That seek to get preferment by the tongue,— or the pen either. On the contrary, we have always been in the unfortunate position of friendlessness of those who cannot take sides but are impartial to all sides.

It is not that I adulate the people :

Without me there are Demagogues enough,
And infidels, to pull down every steeple,
And set up in their stead some proper stuff,
Whether they may sow Scepticism to reap Hell,
As is the Christian dogma rather tough,
I do not know ;—I wish men to be free
As much from mobs and kings—from you as me.
The consequence is, being of no party,
I shall offend all parties.

Tros Tyrivusque mihi nullo discrimine agetur, we are naturally regarded with suspicion in both camps. With respect to the movement for radical and sweeping constitutional changes, we are equally unlucky.

Not ours Sédition's trumpet blast

And threatening word ;

We read the lessons of the Past,

That firm endurance wins at last

More than the sword, or premature fust and clamour. But moderation is the worst sin in the eyes of those who have worked themselves into fury from a fancied sense of grievous wrong.

Of late years, since the growing acerbity and violence of the native press, we have purposely been very particular in our tone and attitude towards Government and Europeans. And we trust we have shown that it is possible to write with temper without sacrificing one iota of independence.

After such a record, attained by long years of patient loyalty to truth and duty according to our lights, and at a cost which the world may know when we are gone, it has come to our lot to be hoisted on the highway as an example of the recklessness and violence of the Native Press, by no less a public censor than the unimpassioned, ever accurate and mealy-mouthed Statesman. We are, however, thankful to our contemporary for the opportunity given to correct a glaring mistake. We only regret that in its righteous indignation and haste to make a point against a neighbour, it did not recognise the palpable mistake we had made. It was a slip—a blunder. Has the Statesman of late become so Celtic as to accept a French epigram for gospel and believe that a blunder is worse than a crime. There are no doubt blunders which are almost criminal, but ours was not of that serious character. Our mistake was open to anybody to detect. For we had given our authority—we were quoting from the Statesman's own correspondence. From first to last in our article no other source of information is named or alluded to. In fact, our contemporary is evidently conscious of this, but it was too bent on contrasting its virtue with the viciousness of another to be scrupulously fair or merciful. If the writer had taken the passage which he has produced from our article as an instance of our sinfulness, from a few lines above he would have let his readers know that we were only following his own correspondent Baboo Pal, and that we had lamentably mistaken that gentleman on one point, though a material point.

We would have come out earlier with our own confession of mistake, but we were precluded from doing so by a personal reason. Of the indigo quarrel in Jessore, we had been free until almost this moment. Not indeed from any want of interest in the subject but under compulsion. When the difficulty first arose we were stretched on the bed of sickness, which had almost proved the bed of death. The Almighty was pleased to preserve us, however. Thereafter we could not easily venture to enter on a question the beginning and progress of which we did not know. Men came to us to request our aid, but they did not fulfil the conditions we thought necessary to ensure fidelity. We may say in passing that in this way we are prevented from taking up or taking up early, many matters of more or less interest or even importance. But we sacrificed much time and thought in the matter, giving advice and trying to induce a settlement. At last matters came to such a pass that we could not remain silent. Then the editor requested the friend who had acted for him so satisfactorily during his illness, as likely to be more informed than himself, to give an article. He did so and it appeared on the 24th May. It was this article which the Statesman noticed. We could not do anything without consulting this gentleman who does not live in town, but we fully expected him to do the needful. He did not do so, unfortunately. We have now seen him, however, and he explains that he had blundered. He caught an erroneous impression from Baboo Pal's description of the quasi-military raid, and writing afterwards partly from memory without going through the long account line by line, he was landed on that misstatement. A most natural thing, however lamentable. But it could mislead no one who had access to the Statesman, as the authority is mentioned.

The very head and front of my offending

Hath this extent, no more.

After all this, we conceive ourselves bound to lay the account of Baboo D. N. Pal before our readers. We regret we have absolutely no space for the whole of his interesting letter, but we will not miss any part of his account. In fact, omitting only a fifth of his communication and that relating to personal explanations and so forth, we give it entire as follows :—

"Benodpore is deserted ;—all the male portion of the population, numbering about 4,000, are hiding themselves in the jungles or in the houses of relatives ; many again have left the village altogether with their families and chattels. Well this is no doubt a very sad state of things, but we must see how it came about. Mr. Sage, the assistant manager in charge of Chaulia factory—by-the-by, Chaulia factory stands just opposite the Benodpore hat—applied for and obtained police protection to sow indigo on a certain plot of land, of which he got legal possession. It may be possible that the court erred in giving him possession. However for this Mr. Sage cannot be found fault with. When Mr. Sage was engaged in sowing, the rayyets came in numbers, attacked Mr. Sage's party, and drove them from the field. The case is sub judice ; but I hope the rayyets will not dispute the facts here stated. But by no manner of means can we find any fault with Mr. Sage. He took legal steps to get possession of the plot of land, then he took the precaution of taking police protection, and finally he judiciously left the field else blood might have been shed and the matter ended most seriously. Although the riot ended in nothing worse than throwing some clods of earth by the rayyets on the planter's party Mr. Sage's well regulated retreat with his men resulted most disastrously with the people of Benodpore. Thousands of innocent men suffered for a guilty few : the village was reduced to desolation, and all this because Mr. Luson was not quite equal to the occasion. When Mr. Sage reported the so-called riot to Mr. Luson, he at once sallied forth with his treasury guard, twelve strong, with a havidar to boot, himself armed with a couple of revolvers, and I think I need not add, he had his whole police contingent behind him :—all this preparation not to bombard a fort, but to arrest a few malaria-stricken Bengalee rioters. Mr. Luson is in charge of the sub-division for a sufficiently long time to know the character of the people, the state of their minds and the nature of their dispute with the planters ; and bearing in mind the fact that he was selected out of many to settle the indigo disturbances, he should have been more cautious and discreet how he acted. But he is young and hasty. He should have known that the rioters were not then on the field ; they could not be possibly arrested on the spot ; Mr. Sage would have to identify the men who were now quietly living in their houses, or had most probably left the village to escape arrest. It was not now an easy task to arrest the real culprits when they were all dispersed. All this did not enter Mr. Luson's head : he stated with his army to arrest people who were nowhere to be found, and unfortunately when he reached Benodpore hat the time had come and many thousands of people had assembled to buy and sell. He should not have gone direct into the hat with his treasury guard and army of police, for at least he should have known the state of the feelings of the people—how they were all almost frantic regarding the indigo disputes. If he went he should not have arrested people in the hat, where many thousands of men had assembled and where identification was impossible. But he arrested thirteen men, most probably innocent men. This arrival of the Luson army and final arrest of men, I need not say, created quite a panic in the hat ; people began to run away in all directions ; only those whose relatives and friends were arrested came towards Mr. Luson to appeal to him to release the innocent men. Mr. Luson, the strong and courageous, lost his head. Seeing a sudden gholmal amongst the hat people numbering about five to six thousand, he fancied that they were coming to attack his party. It would be indeed an epoch in the history of Bengal when half-starved and malaria-stricken Bengalee rayyets ventured to attack an European magistrate with twelve treasury guards with bayonets glittering in the sun and a contingent of police. It is said that Mr. Luson was also supported by two other Europeans, Mr. Selby and Mr. Sage, of the indigo factory. They also were well armed. Mr. Luson was surely reading the narratives of riots now taking place in many European cities and thought he was in Europe instead of in a Bengal village. Fortunate however that he did not give orders to fire. But he did not however rest here ; he precipitately left Benodpore and sent such a harrowing report of the affair to the Government that police Inspector Peters with 40 men were at once directed to proceed to Benodpore to preserve the peace or to protect Mr. Luson. I did not know that an European officer's weakness could have carried him so far. Even Inspector Peters with his 40 men can not sufficiently reassure Mr. Luson. A detachment of military police has also been sent to help Mr. Luson out of the difficulty. How Sir Stewart Bayley or Mr. Smith could believe Mr. Luson's report is a wonder ! They have made a mountain out of a molehill. The rayyets heard that soldiers were coming, and they were also told by designing men that they would be all bayoneted by the sepoys. They were panic-stricken and fled from the village. If they really defied the Government and ventured to attack Mr. Luson—if they were really so determined, they would not have surely fled thus. Inspector Peters with 40 sepoys would not then be sufficient to quell a rebellion of thousands. The fact of the people of Benodpore breaking into a rebellion was only in Mr. Luson's over-excited imagination. However, the looting of the village by the police and factory men is not a fact. The people deserted the village not for the looting, if there was looting at all, but for the soldiers' rumoured coming and sacking of their village. If the soldiers had gone, they would have seen that the soldiers whom they pay were sent not to maltreat them, but to protect them, when they would soon have come back to their homes. If they have suffered, they have suffered for the lawless conduct of their neighbours. Their neighbours had no business to take the law into their own hands and attack Mr. Sage. They should have gone to Mr. Luson, instead of allowing Mr. Sage to go to him. If they were wronged, and if they were sure that justice would not be meted out to them by Mr. Luson, still they were not justified in taking the law into their own hands. This is British law, and they must abide by it. They had the Magistrate of Jessore, the District Judge, the High Court, the Lieutenant-Governor, the Viceroy, the Secretary of State, and the Parliament to appeal to, but they had no business to attack or to threaten to attack Mr. Sage. And if they have broken the law, they must suffer. It is not probable that 4,000 men of Benodpore were all in the riot; but why did not the law-abiding portion advise the others to be law-abiding? and why did they not prevent them from breaking the law? If their advice was not listened to, why did they not point out the law-breakers and have them punished? If they were all in league, they must thank themselves for the trouble that they are in. If Baroda Kanta Sukar called Mr. Luson to his face vah, and Mr. Luson gave him a horse whipping, even Mr. Luson would have been fined by an honorary magistrate ten rupees and told that he had no business to take the law into his own hands. I beg to tell the friends of the rayyets most emphatically that they should one and all tell the rayyets to be law-abiding—notwithstanding all they suffer, else they forfeit the sympathy of all right-minded men. As for the looting:—On the 24th April the police went to Benodpore to make further arrests of the rioters, and some factory men went with them to identify. Well, we should remember that the same evening Inspector Peters with his sepoy's reached Benodpore. The news of their coming reached the villagers long before their arrival, so the police found the village almost deserted. But the police are the police always, and the officer in charge went on to arrest people that were nowhere. They entered many houses to enquire, but found them deserted; so, I need not tell you, that they did not fail to give here a kick and there a kick, scattering things all over the house, to show that they were the police and must be feared and respected. The police underlings and factory coolies perhaps did some business for their own benefit, picking up this and that from the deserted houses—I hope quite unnoticed by the police officer. Thus we see it is not at all a looting affair, but a police enquiry. As the enquiry was held in a deserted village, the police underlings tried to display their prowess, and as there were men from the opposite party to identify, there is no doubt a good deal of damage was done. This is also the result of Mr. Luson's indiscretion. Evidently the police officer was not quite competent for his task; when he found the village in such a state he should have returned and stated the fact to Mr. Luson. If he at all thought proper to enter houses to see whether people were hiding themselves or not, he should have kept a very sharp eye on his men, especially those of the factory. Surely he did nothing of the sort, or else such sensational reports of looting of an entire village by the police would not have come to us. Really, there was no looting and no great damage done,—simply the village is temporarily deserted, and that too not for the so-called looting or the police either, but for the coming of the soldiers. Still such reports have been circulated and a great slur has been cast on the police."

It was grievously unfortunate that our esteemed contributor missed the statement that no guns were fired. We can only express our sorrow at having been the vehicle of such a gross misstatement in so grave a particular.

A SURVIVAL OF CENTRAL ASIAN BARBARISM IN ARYAN INDIA.

SOME of the Brahmans, Khettris and Aroras of the Punjab are afflicted with a more than ordinarily inconvenient obligation imposed on them by themselves or rather their forefathers. It is for the whole womankind of every tribe to mourn for every individual loss. That the near kith and kin and relations should grieve and even demonstrate their grief in an overt way, is but natural. Among these people the demonstration of sorrow, if not the sorrow, extends to all the connections of the family. Nay, more, much more than that; whole tribe or clan goes into mourning. Nor is this universal and ever-recurring mourning lightened by the manner thereof. The mere assumption of an inky cloak of alpaca or the customary suits of solemn black, would not matter much. But these Brahmans and Khettris are far more exacting on themselves and their caste-fellows. Their custom is vexatiousness itself. For a whole year, they have to maintain this absurd mummary of a make-believe general woe. It is bad enough that the female relatives should grieve for a single death from morn to noon, from noon to dewy eve, from day to day, all round the year. But it is incredible that all the women folk of the whole caste should repair to the house of mourning to keep the family in countenance and swell the chorus of lamentation—to their own and the others' injury, in health, in substance, and in morale, and the distress of the whole neighbourhood. Yet so it is, we are informed. And this in the heart of India!—in centres of civilization like Lahore, the capital of the Punjab, and Amritsar, the Jerusalem of the Sikhs! The height of absurdity could no further go. The very nomads of the steppes of Central Asia are wiser than these proud Aryas of the original home of the Aryas in India. These Brahmans and Aroras certainly carry with them the proof of their descent. Their customary sorrow for the dead is in the main strangely identical with that of the denizens of the desert beyond the Himalaya and the Hindoo Koosh. Only it seems as though their kind had, in the course of the ages and cycles, made some progress even in their bleak home and in the uncertainties of their mode of living, while the more favoured colonists down South, with all the advantages of climate and order and government and learning and arts, had remained stationary—the barbarians of old. The wild Tartars too drag the burden of a protracted sorrowing for the dead of the most conventional and mechanical kind. But in making of themselves fools enough they show more common sense than their Indian brethren. They work all day, men, women, and children, and reserve their weeping and wailing for their leisure in the evening. Indeed, they are always busy or usefully employed all their waking hours. In the day the women work in the open around their habitations, but at night-fall they retire within and devote themselves to light duty, chiefly spinning. It is while at this monotonous occupation that they all strike up their sing-song lament, describing the dead and painting the consequences of the loss with realistic minuteness. This, continued all through the twelvemonth, as it is, is scarcely less impressive as a demonstration and undoubtedly far less wasteful than the mode of these peculiar Hindoos of Amritsar and Lahore. Besides, in Central Asia the thing is confined to the women of the household. The Khirghises and others never go the length of prescribing the mourning for the whole clan for any death in any particular family. It is fortunate that the inconvenient and degrading custom is confined to the members of the three castes in the two cities or districts. It is a relief to learn that the Aroras of Lahore at least have at length had the common-sense to discard the Pburi, as their mourning is called. The reformers among them had a difficult task in persuading their caste-fellows. Their names should be published. We congratulate them on their success. They have done a distinct service and promoted civilization among a not unimportant section of the Hindu community and of the people of India. And we venture to hope that their example will soon bring the rest—the majority—round.

A DEMONSTRATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF Reis & Rayyet.

SIR,—A public Thanksgiving Service for the recovery of Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee from his serious illness, was held at the Suburban Town of Baranagar (his Native Town), on Saturday the 31st May, and Sunday the 1st June, 1890, when the following Programme was observed—

SATURDAY.

- 9 P.M.—Gathering of all classes and sections of the community and spontaneous demonstrations of thanksgiving.
- The reciting of a Congratulatory Poem composed for the occasion by Baboo Satya Prakash Banerjee.
- 9-30 P.M.—Nautch commenced—dancing and singing opened by Shree Jan and followed by Beggā.
- 11-55 P.M.—Europeans and other non-Hindoo's left, and
- 12 P.M.—Hindoo Worship began, followed by dinner to Brahmans and others.

SUNDAY.

- 2 A.M.—Nautches were resumed, and continued till 7 A.M. in the morning.
- 8 A.M.—Bengali operatic plays (Jutra) by Ram Charan Manna, till 5 in the afternoon.
- The Nahabat kept playing seasonable pieces of music during the interludes. The arch of the Nahabat stand was decorated with the words painted on crimson cloth in English and Bengali characters, "God be Praised for Dr. Mookerjee's Recovery."

The following is the congratulatory poem referred to above—

In Eastern style we all unite
To thank Him who Supreme doth reign;—
Rejoice'd to hail our Village Light
Restored to health and us again.
The Princes' pet—the Peasants' friend,
To us all here an idol dear;
Though meek not weak to Right defend,
Humble yet rich with genius rare.
A Scholar Sage of sterling name,
Renown'd—revered, near, far and wide;
By 'breath' not berthed on heights of Fame,
But own'd by all as th' country's Pride.
God bless thee Sire! yet spare thee long
To wield the pen in India's need,
The Rayyet's rights to shield from wrong,
To yield the Reis what is his need.

I take this opportunity of publicly conveying my grateful acknowledgments to Baboos Sarada Prasad Bannerjee, Nilmani Bagchi, and Kumud Nath Banerjee, my colleagues in the Committee, for the great help and cordial co-operation which I received from them in the successful management of the work, as well as to the large number of persons who have subscribed funds for meeting the cost of the ceremony.

WOOMESH CHUNDER MITTER,
Secretary, Public Thanksgiving Service Committee.

An Old Official Paper.

ACQUISITION OF SURPLUS LAND FOR RESALE TO PAY THE COST OF NEW STREETS.

From the Secretary to the Commissioners for the improvement of the Town of Calcutta,

To W. Grey, Esq., Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

Dated Calcutta, 13th March, 1856.

SIR,

I am directed by the Commissioners for the Improvement of the Town of Calcutta to forward for the information of His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, a statement of particulars and results of their endeavours, to purchase land under the provisions of Act 22 of 1847, for the purpose of opening out a new street in Soortee Bagaun, from Machooa Bazar Road to Colootollah, and for the purposes of the Oriental Gas Company adjacent thereto. For facility of reference, I have the honor to forward a plan of the locality on which the various parcels of land are marked with letters, the purposes for which they were required are given in a reference in the margin; and is also herewith appended.

2nd. In the Commissioners' letter cited in the margin (No. 1530, dated 6th October, 1854) it was proposed to commence upon the above portion of a new street which was intended to run the whole length North and South of the Town; this portion being selected as the most easy and least expensive of the whole line, from the absence of all expensive property standing thereon. The several parcels of land required for this purpose are coloured on the plan and marked C. F. E. H. I. and a portion of A. respectively.

3rd. To this portion the Government sanction (Government letter, No. 2282, dated 16th October, 1854) was received, specifying also, that the estimated cost Rs. 1,08,298 is to "be subsequently in part recovered by the sale of the surplus land lying on either side of the new street."

4th. Subsequently to the receipt of this letter however, doubts having arisen as to the powers conveyed in the Act (12 of 1852) to take any more land than that which was absolutely essential for the street or thoroughfare only, and under advice from Counsel the Commissioners in a letter (No. 1721, dated 17th March, 1855) to Government more especially explained that their intention was not to take land for the actual width of the intended street only; but also portions of land in excess of the actual width of the proposed street, to the extent of 50 feet on either side, and either themselves to build on it, or to resell to others to build such houses or shops only, as would add to the appearance, ventilation, cleanliness, health, and general improvement of the Town.

5th. To this a reply from Government was received (a copy of which for facility of reference is appended, Government letter, No. 443, dated 30th March, 1855) by which His Honor authorizes the Commissioners "to purchase so much land with the buildings thereupon, as is required to open out a new street between Colootollah and Machooa Bazar Street; including both such land as is necessary for the construction of a public road, and so much on either side thereof as is necessary for proper frontage, for ventilation, and for the general sanitary improvements contemplated in connection with the said thoroughfare."

6th. The site of the Oriental Gas Company's central station having been also fixed in the Soortee Bagaun, with a frontage to the proposed street, the further portions of land shown on the plan and marked respectively A. B. C. D. were eventually required for this purpose. That marked A the property of Government was early in April 1855 placed at the disposal of the Oriental Gas Company, in accordance with the terms of the Government letter No. 129 dated 25th January addressed to the Oriental Gas Company. The Commissioners having previously made the necessary arrangements for compensating the tenants, under the authority of the Government letter No. 306 dated 1st March 1855, and the entire expenses thus incurred, viz., Rs. 1,740 were repaid to the Commissioners by Government. That portion of A coloured green, on the plan within the line of the street was afterwards given up to the public for that purpose by the Government in their letter No. 132 dated 25th January 1855. The portion B for the purposes of the Oriental Gas Company, was sanctioned by His Honor in the Government letter No. 306, March 1st 1855; and that of the further portions C and D in the letter No. 1,023 dated 8th June 1855. The land marked K was public property. The small triangular portion O, belonging to a private proprietor it had been mutually arranged should be given up in lieu of the adjacent portion marked P.

7th. It therefore was the duty of the Commissioners to effect the purchase of the several portions marked B. C. D. E. F. G. H. and I. respectively; and their powers for this purpose were contained in the Act 22 of 1847.

8th. The Commissioners bearing in mind the larger work of improvement, which they contemplated would ultimately be carried out, viz., the opening of a magnificent central thoroughfare from North to South, through the entire length of the town (and towards which this was only the commencement of operations) were anxious to take such steps as would enable them to execute the entire work with the greatest possible economy; and well knowing that the first purchases made would be a material and important guide for the rates to be afterwards paid, they proceeded with extreme caution to make their first purchases, and proposed to put the powers of the Act in force to obtain an equitable adjustment of the early purchases; preferring then to meet the law expenses incidental to forced sales, rather than to make amicable terms at higher rates for the reason above stated.

9th. The first portion, towards the purchase of which their attention was directed is marked E; proceeding in accordance with the provisions of the Act and entirely under advice of their lawyers, a notice for purchase of this land was served on the proprietor on the 28th November 1854, a reply was received thereto on the 15th January 1855 demanding Rs. 300 per cottah for the land, the Commissioners after mature enquiry and consideration instructed their Solicitors to offer Rs. 100 per cottah for the same, which was believed to be the full value. To this no reply was received; accordingly in pursuance of the provisions of the Act, a Precept was issued by the Sheriff for assessing the amount of compensation by a Common Jury, and the case was tried on the 23rd March, when a verdict was given for Rs. 8,800, which was at the rate of Rs. 100 per cottah, precisely the amount offered by the Commissioners; the total amount of costs incurred in the case, in accordance with the provisions of existing law was divided; and the amount of costs paid by the Commissioners was Rs. 795-9-10. Some considerable delay took place on the part of the opposite side, in furnishing a good and valid title, notwithstanding the repeated application of the Commissioners' Solicitors; who then advised that the amount of compensation money Rs. 8,800 should be deposited with the Government Agent, and the Commissioners on the 8th May paid the above amount to their Solicitors for this purpose; but the attorney on the opposite side having again requested further time, to enable them to furnish the required title, the payment of compensation money was delayed till June 8th 1855, and on the 11th June the Conveyance of the land to the Commissioners was received by them, together with a Bond of Indemnity to the Commissioners and a declaration before a Notary of the fact, that the late proprietor had been in possession of the land for upwards of 30 years; these two latter documents having been necessary on account of the old Pottah under which it was held having been slightly incorrect; and under advice of their Solicitors the Commissioners completed the purchase under these conditions, a further Bill of costs was paid by the Commissioners on account of charges incurred subsequent to the award of the Jury amounting to Rs. 266.

The total cost of this 4 Biggahs 7 Cottahs 14 Chittacks was therefore as follows:--

Amount of compensation awarded by Jury.....	Rs.	8,800	0	0
1st Bill of Cost.....		795	9	10
	Rs.....	9,861	9	10

and the time expended in obtaining possession, from the first institution of proceedings for that purpose, viz., from 28th November 1854 to 11th June 1855, occupying a period of nearly 7 months.

10th. The portion of land marked B sanctioned by Government on the 1st March 1855, was next purchased, on the 17th of the same month notice for the purchase of this was served on the proprietor, the Commissioners at the same time offering the full value estimated according to the adjoining lot before valued by the Jury, at the rate of Rupees 100 per Cottah; on the 17th April following a reply was received, asking at the rate of Rupees 300 per Cottah, and intimating that in the event of the Commissioners objecting to give this rate, the proprietor would refer the matter to arbitration, and naming an arbitrator on his behalf.---The rate being in the opinion of the Commissioners altogether unreasonable they therefore at once directed their Solicitors to take the necessary steps for referring the matter to arbitration, according to the provisions of the Act 22 of 1847---which allows the proprietor to select this mode of settlement if he think fit. After some delay contingent upon the different constructions of which the Act is susceptible, in consequence of which the opinion of Counsel as to the correct mode of proceeding was obtained, the Arbitrators were appointed, and an Umpire nominated by them on the 25th May following. The land was inspected by the Arbitrators and Counsel and on 16th of June evidence was taken before the Arbitrators at the Town Hall; at this meeting the Arbitrators were unable to agree upon the amount of compensation, one Arbitrator required that further evidence should be taken, and the other objecting thereto; the matter was then referred to the Umpire, who having personally inspected the land, a sitting was held on the 14th July; Counsel on both sides were then heard, and an adjournment was made till the 16th, when the arguments on both sides were brought to a close; and on the 30th of the same month (July) the award of the Umpire in the case was forwarded to the Commissioners, viz., for the 14 Cottahs 7 Chittacks and 9 square feet of land, Company's Rupees 2,167-8-9; or at the rate of Rupees 150 per Cottah; this award being at a higher rate than the offer made by the Commissioners, although only half of that demanded by the proprietor, entailed upon them, on the behalf of Government, the payment of the entire costs of the case, amounting to Company's Rupees 2,919-1-6.

Immediately upon receipt of the award, the Commissioners paid over the amount to their Solicitors, and instructed them to obtain the necessary title deeds and conveyance to them, but delay occurring on the part of the opposite side in furnishing the necessary documents, on August 10th the Commissioners' Solicitors were instructed, on the expiration of a notice of one week to that effect, to deposit the amount with the Government Agent as provided by the Act;—this however became unnecessary and on the 21st August the title deeds, conveyances, &c. were duly forwarded to the Commissioners. It will be seen by the statement referred to that the cost of this land to Government was, Purchase Money 2,167-8-0, Costs 2,919-1-6, Total 5,086-9-6, and the time occupied in effecting the purchase under the provisions of this Act, notwithstanding the anxious endeavours of the Commissioners to expedite to the utmost the procuring of the land, which was urgently required by the Gas Company, occupied from the 17th March till the 21st August upwards of 5 months. After the expiration of a notice to the tenants to quit within one month the land was handed over to the Gas Company, in accordance with the provisions of the Government instructions, and the works of the Oriental Gas Company are now rapidly progressing thereon.

11th. For the land marked F on the plan the Commissioners first gave notice for purchase of a portion, containing 4 Biggahs 14 Cottahs on the 28th November 1854.

On the 19th December following, a reply was received objecting to sell more than the quantity of land actually required for the bare width of the proposed new street; and on the 26th December a further communication was received asking Rs. 350 per Cottah.

The Commissioners however delayed proceedings in this case, till the amount of compensation to be paid for the portion E should be determined, and when the award of the Jury on the 23rd March for that land was given at Rs. 100 per Cottah, the Commissioners immediately instructed their Solicitors to issue a fresh notice for purchase, and to offer the same rate, viz., Rs. 100 per Cottah, for a smaller portion than that included in the 1st notice, viz., for that titled and marked F containing 3 Biggahs.

The proprietor declined to accept these terms, and demanded that the amount of compensation should be referred to arbitration in a letter dated April 10th 1855, accordingly arbitrators and an Umpire were appointed.

The Government sanction (Government letter No. 1023 dated 8th June 1855) to the purchase of the portion D, belonging to the same proprietor as F, for the purposes of the Oriental Gas Company, having been received on the 8th June—a notice for the purchase of this portion also, was immediately served by the Commissioners' Solicitors.

Prior however to further proceedings being adopted, a letter was received from the proprietor on the 30th July 1855, offering to take the same rate for both portions, viz., for that marked D and for as much of the portion marked F as was required for the street; as that which should be awarded by the Arbitrator for the portion B, and requesting in the event of the Commissioners agreeing to this proposition that further proceedings with reference to the Arbitration should be stayed.

The Commissioners assented to this mode of fixing the value of the land, and after the decision of the case B, viz., Rupees 150 per Cottah (on the 30th July) they immediately gave instructions to their Solicitors to examine the title deeds, and prepare the conveyance of the land to them.

An intimation was however received by the Commissioners on the 23rd August that there was another party, a minor, who had an equal share in the property, with Baboo Neelmadhub Sein who had hitherto appeared as the only proprietor.

The land moreover was mortgaged to a third party. Under these somewhat complicated circumstances, the opinion of Counsel was obtained as to the correct mode of proceeding. This was to the effect, that all previous proceedings with regard to this land, must now be rejected as useless; and that it would first be necessary to petition the Supreme Court to appoint a guardian to protect the interests of the infant co-proprietor with Baboo Neelmadhub Sein—that according to the 5th Section of the Act 22 of 1847 it would be necessary, that the amount of compensation should be settled by a special jury, and by Section 8th fresh notices must be issued to all persons interested in the property.

Accordingly the above proceedings were duly instituted, and two separate inquisitions were held before the Sheriff on the 24th and 25th September 1855, when a verdict was given for the portion of land marked F at Rs. 9,000, and for the portion marked D Rs. 862-8-0, these prices being at the rate of Rs. 150 per Cottah as per former amicable agreement; and in consideration of there being no opposition it was necessary that the Commissioners should pay all costs. The above amounts were accordingly paid to the Commissioners' Solicitors on the 1st October, to be invested in Government papers, and forthwith deposited with the Government Agent, according to the terms of an order which was obtained from the Supreme Court.

The deeds of sale were received and signed by the Commissioners on the 12th October; and the lands in question passed into their possession.

The portion F comprises 3 Biggahs amounts as per verdict.....	9,000	0	0
Messrs. Thomas and Dow's Bill of cost.....	896	15	3
Do. for Bill of Sale	152	3	0
Portion of Messrs. Smoult and Denman's Bill of cost amtg. to Rs. 68	62	0	0
Do. for arbitration	100	0	0
Total.....	10,211	2	3

and for the portion D comprising 5 Cottahs, 12 Chittacks amount of compensation as per verdict Co.'s Rupees	862	8	0
Messrs. Thomas and Dow's Bill of Costs.....	699	12	0
Do. for Bill of Sale.....	85	0	0

Thus the total costs in this amicable suit was Rs. 2,001-14-3, and the period from the 28th March till 12th October upwards of 6 months, was consumed in order to obtain possession of this land and before it could be entered upon for the purpose in view.

12th. For the portions marked H, and I, in the plan a notice was issued on the 28th November 1854 to Chittromoney Dossee as co-proprietress with Baboo Tarranauth Mullick. It was afterwards found that the proprietors were distinct, I being the property of Chittromoney Dossee and H the property of Baboo Tarranauth Mullick.

Accordingly fresh notices were served on both proprietors for their respective portions, on the 28th March 1855 and again on July 2nd 1855; on the 16th replies were received from the Solicitors to the proprietors Chittromoney Dossee naming Rs. 600 per Cottah for her portion (I); and Baboo Tarranauth Mullick naming Rs. 400 for his (F); and both demanding in case of the Commissioners' refusal to accede to these terms, that the amount of compensation should be settled by Special Jury.

13th. On December 12th, the Commissioners instructed their Solicitors to offer Chittromoney Dossee at the rate of Rs. 225 per cottah, that being the full estimated value of the whole plot, for her portion I; it was then found that since the service of notice (2nd July) Chittromoney Dossee had died, and a fresh notice was ordered on the 9th January 1856 to be served by the Commissioners' Solicitors on the present proprietors—since which no further proceedings have been taken with regard to this land, marked I. on the plan.

14th. On the 12th December, Commissioners' Solicitors were directed to offer Baboo Tarranauth Mullick at the rate of Rs. 180 per Cottah for his portion H—on the 23rd January 1856, the Commissioners however sanctioned the terms which had been made by their Surveyor for this land, viz., Rs. 10,700 free of all charges to the proprietor, or at the rate of Rs. 210-13-3 per Cottah to avoid all law charges, and instructions were given to the Commissioners' Solicitors, to prepare the deed of conveyance of the land to the Commissioners at these terms. This is the present state of affairs in reference to this portion, marked H on the plan.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—A frequent cause of gout and rheumatism is the inflammatory state of the blood, attended with bad digestion and general debility. A few doses of the Pills taken in time are an effectual preventive against gout and rheumatism. Any one who has an attack of either should use Holloway's Ointment also, the powerful action of which, combined with the operation of the Pills, must infallibly effect a cure. These Pills act directly on the blood, which they purify and improve. Having once subdued the severity of these diseases, perseverance with the Ointment, after fomenting the affected joints with warm brine, will speedily relax all stiffness and prevent any permanent contraction.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer. Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

A FEW SHORT YEARS.

A FEW short years—and then
What changes Time hath wrought !
So strange they seem, we scarce can deem
*The world, our life, ourselves are aught
• But one long fitful dream.

The clouds that fly
Across the sky,
Waves tossed upon the sea,
• Shadows that pass
Before a glass,
Our fitting emblems be.

A few short years—and then
Where are the hopes that shone
When youth with flowers enwreathed the hours,
And earth had but one music tone
Of joy for us and ours ?

The rainbow's hues,
The morning's dews,
The blossoms of a day,
The trembling sheen
On water seen

More stable are than they.

A few short years—and then
Where is the ad'mant chain
That passion wrought, and madly thought
Nor time nor change could ever strain
Till life's last strife was fought ?

A rope of sand,
A gross'mer band ;
• The filmy threads at e'en
• The spider weaves
Amongst the leaves
A firmer bond had been.

A few short years—and then
Where is Ambition's pile,
That rose so high against the sky,
O'ershadowing all around the while
With its proud boast might vie ?

• A shadow's shade,
A card-house made
By children for their play ;
The air-blown bells
The folly swells
May vaunt a surer stay.

A few short years—and then
Where is the mighty grief
That wrung the heart with torture's art,
And made it feel that its relief
Time's hand could ne'er impart ?
A stream that's burst,
And done its worst,
Then left the heaven more clear ;
• A night-mare dread,
With morning fled,
These sorrows now appear.

A few short years—and then
What of our life remains,
The smiles and tears of other years,
• Of passion's joys, of sorrow's pains,
• Ambition's hopes and fears ?
A faded dream
To-day they seem
Which memory scarce can trace—
But seals they've set
Shall Time nor yet
Eternity efface !

AGNES SMITH.

DEVOTION.

I NEVER could find a good reason
Why sorrow unbidden should stay,
• And all the bright joys of life's season
Be driven unheeded away.
• Our cares would wake no more emotion,
Were we to our lot but resigned,
• Than pebbles flung into the ocean,
That leave scarce a ripple behind.

The world has a spirit of beauty,
Which looks upon all for the best ;
And while it discharges its duty,
To Providence leaves all the rest.
That spirit's the beam of devotion,
Which lights us through life to its close,
And sets like the sun in the ocean,
More beautiful far than it rose.

Holloway's Pills.—Pure Blood.—When the Blood is pure, its circulation calm and equable, and the nerves well strung, we are well. These Pills possess a marvellous power in securing these essentials of health by purifying, regulating, and strengthening the fluids and solids. Holloway's Pills can be confidently recommended to all persons suffering from disordered digestion or worried by nervous fancies, or neuralgic pains. They correct acidity and heart-burn, dispel sick headache, quicken the action of the liver, and act as alteratives and gentle aperients. The weak and delicate may take them without fear. Holloway's Pills are eminently serviceable to invalids of irritable constitution, as they raise the action of every organ to its natural standard, and universally exercise a calming and sedative influence.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE heat in Madras at the end of the last month and the beginning of this was unbearable. The educational institutions were closed. So were the Civil Courts of the City for the most part, the Chief Justice alone keeping himself ready at 24 hours' notice for urgent matters, and in the Small Cause Court Mr. Poonosawmy Pillai alone of the three Judges attending. The magistracy could not for obvious reasons be closed.

A FLIGHT of locusts passed over Lucknow on the 4th instant. A million or two lighted on and about the cantonments. Luckily, there were no crops to injure.

As a result of the melting of snow high up the hills, Indus has from the latter end of May been rising gradually, until on the 31st ultimo it was 16 feet high above the watermark.

IN the United States the newspapers do not mince matters but tell plain and plump what they think of a man. This is what a leading Californian journal prints about a great millionaire of San Francisco :—

"Money is Mr.——'s only god, and the hope of attaining the sacred circle of the New York Four Hundred is the Mecca to which he turns and bows and makes his daily prayer. To do this he has purchased as son-in-law an expensive and profligate German prince; rumour fixes six millions of dollars as the price. To attain this social position, he purchases a lot on Fifth Avenue for 400,000 dols., and is building a palatial family residence thereon at the rumoured cost of two millions of dollars, and yet Mr.——has the effrontery to pretend that it is his intention to reside in San Francisco and identify himself with California people and make his home among them."

As we announced last week, the Hon'ble Syed Ameer Hossein, C.I.E., goes on thirty-one days' leave from the 20th instant, and Moulvie Abdul Jubber, from Alipore, acts as Northern Division Magistrate of the town of Calcutta.

MR. H. Luson, the Joint, is after all Gazetted away from Magura and Jhenida, and is to act as full Magistrate of Moorshedabad.

SURGEON-MAJOR E. A. Birch is Gazetted Principal of the Medical College, Calcutta, in place of Brigade-Surgeon J. M. Coates retiring from the service.

THE Godhra and Rutlam Railway may be commenced by October or November next. It is estimated to be 120 miles long, connecting the Bombay, Baroda Railway with the Ajmere-Khandwa branch of the Rajputana-Malwa system.

THE Calcutta Medical College Session, 1890-91, begins from the 23rd June next. Applications for admission must be made on or before that date. Students who have not passed the First Arts examination will not be eligible.

THEY had a Horse and Dog Show at Simla last Saturday. But for the weather, it is reported to be a complete success. The entries were many and there was satisfaction on all sides. The best horse proved to be a waler of General Luck's, and the best dog a spaniel owned by Dr. Owen. The Maharana of Dholpur was awarded the jumping competition.

UNDER the advice of our Foreign Department, the Maharaja of Jodhpur has abolished all transit duties throughout his territory.

THE Agricultural Exhibition held in December at Bellary is declared a failure by the Madras Board, the Governor in Council concurring. Only a little more than half the prizes offered were awarded.

THE property of the Elia Rajah of Cochin, who lately died at Benares, has been sold for educational and other charitable uses.

AN Abu letter dated the 2nd June in the Eastern Herald reports that, under pressure from the politicals, the Maharaja of Serohi has rescinded the sale by public auction to Dhunjeebhoy of the liquor contract in his territory, and given it to Messrs. Framjee & Co. And this,

"notwithstanding the opposition made by another Maharaja to whom the matter had been referred for opinion and who spoke highly of Mr. Dhunjeebhoy and even went so far as to stand surety for any breach of contract that might hereafter be committed by the latter."

It is believed that a high official in the Serohi service is at the bottom of this vacillation. This unfaithful man is said to have taken the part of the Framjees and misrepresented poor Dhunjeebhoy to Colonel Powlet, Political Agent, Western Rajputana, and, through that officer, got the regular sale cancelled. The letter adds :—

"The occurrence of a stirring event like the present one has, no doubt, caused a great sensation amongst merchants of all classes who are much afraid lest their business connected with Native States be wholly or partially stopped by the interference of the Politicals without any ground of their so meddling."

THE Madras Times of the 5th publishes the following "urgent, strictly private and confidential" Congress circular, which has come into its possession :—

"The Committee Office, 100, Mount Road, Madras, 13th May, 1890. Dear Sir,—From telegrams, extracts from which are printed overleaf, you will see how urgently money is required by the Indian Political Agency. I sent about seven circular letters to the secretaries of several district committees for funds, but not one of them remitted any portion of its contribution. The Madras Committee promised to pay Rs. 6,400 as a contribution this year, but not one pice has been paid yet towards that amount. No day passes without my receiving telegrams or letters from the Hon'ble Pandit Adjudhia Nath of Allahabad to remit funds forthwith. He receives letters by every mail and urgent telegrams every week from Mr. Hume and Mr. Digby, urging him to send money at once as the expenses in England are getting very heavy. If money is not sent forthwith to the London Committee, I fear the whole work will have to be stopped there. May I ask you, therefore, to bring the matter before your local committee, and to urge them to take urgent steps in the matter? If each delegate and sympathiser with the Congress will pay Rs. 10, the amount required would be easily collected. This is a very critical time, and we must redeem the promises to Mr. Hume which we made most solemnly: so I entreat you to send any amount you can towards the payment of the Madras contribution for the year 1890, whether your committee moves in the matter or not."

The telegrams referred to in the above circular are from Pandit Adjudhia Nath. One, dated 10th May says: "Digby wires for £500. No funds. Send money." Another, dated 11th idem, says: "Digby again telegraphs to-day. Must have money or work must stop. Make country send thousand pounds, very urgent, home."

The following is an extract from Mr. Hume's letter :—

"We have now made a beginning towards establishing the finances of our movement on a healthy footing. I appeal to you all, as honest earnest men, now, when the time has come to make bona fide strenuous exertions, first to get all the promised contributions paid in promptly; secondly, to get the rest of the allotted contributions raised in due course; and lastly, to secure from every one round you, rich and poor, some additional aid for the General Congress Fund. You are all proved to be hot enough and enthusiastic enough about these matters in the Congress, but when you get back to your homes you seem to grow cold and callous, and I can get little real work out of too many of you. What words can I use strong enough to pierce your hearts and to sting you into exertions such as Englishmen would make in like cases? You do owe something to me for subordinating everything in my life to your cause and your welfare. Indeed, you acknowledge this in words, and cheer me and make far more fuss over me personally than I either desire or deserve. Do now, for once show by your acts in this your own work that you really and truly feel something of what you so generously profess."

OUR Anglo-Indian friends are making merry, as is their wont, over the literary laches of a poor uneducated native. We read :—

"A Bengali Babu applied a few days back to the head of an office for an appointment, and was requested to write an essay on the horse. This is what he wrote :—'The horse is a four-footed animal. He is very important to the human being. He has a long smoothed hair on his neck and his foot is not cut into two parts just like other four-footed animals. He is very useful to the man in the battle-field. His head is supported to the neck. The horse who is trained perfectly well can understand the voice of the people and can thoroughly perform the duties to his master. His speed is very swift and he can easily drag a long heavy gun on his back, though the road is uneven. He can gallop very quickly at least twenty miles in an hour. Arab horse is better in every respect than that of India. It is no doubt that the horse is the best of all animals in the world.' There are two remarkable points about this essay; one, that the horse's 'head is supported to the neck'; and the other, that 'he can easily drag a long heavy gun on his back.' That Bengali Babu did not get an appointment."

Of course every wretched Bengali is, in European estimation, a Babu. As for the curiosity of literature quoted, at least the Indian essayist can spell and punctuate, which is more than can be said of millions of Her Majesty's Christian subjects throughout the globe.

THE new regiments raised in Upper Burma from the Indian Military Police, says the Pioneer, are to be known as the first, second and third Regiments of Burma Infantry.

IN December last, Brigadier-General W. T. Budgen, D. S. O., commanding the Bombay District, had a fall from his horse while on duty. The Bombay Government have, for that fall, now ordered a daily gratuity of £2-10 to the rider for six months.

ON the recommendation of the Government of India, the Secretary of State has sanctioned an increment of Rs. 50 for Sub-Assistant Superintendents, 1st Grade, Telegraph Department, who have more than five years' continuous service in that grade, and a second increment of Rs. 50 for officers of the above grade who have more than ten years' continuous service in that grade. But in neither case is the increment to be granted to more than two-thirds of the number who may be eligible by length of service in the grade, one extra being counted for a fraction in each case. The increments will not merely depend on the length of service. There must be special recommendation in each case to the Director General of Telegraphs who is empowered to make the grants. The concession comes into effect from the 5th April 1890, the date of sanction by the Secretary of State, and will be in operation for five years.

MAHARANI Surnomoyee has filed a suit in the Original Side of the High Court, Calcutta, claiming Rs. 25,000 as damages, against one Omrao Sing for obstructing the light and air of her premises No. 374, Upper Chitpore Road, by building a house close by.

BOMBAY is primus urbs in Indis even in law. The London Correspondent of the Indian Spectator writes under date the 9th May:—

"Yesterday was decided by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council an Appeal case from Bengal, which has a special interest on your side, because of the Bombay authorities on which the final decision was founded. Rajah Upendra Bhupat Mahaputra, the Rajah of one of the tributary zemindary estates of Orissa, died in 1857, leaving an illegitimate son born of a Dasiputra or slave girl, and a legitimate son, Rajah Nunkshore Bhupat. The latter succeeded to the Raj. He died in 1878, and the estate and raj-gaddi was claimed by his illegitimate brother, born of the slave girl, as aforesaid, named Nitjanand Mansing. The Rajah's family were Sudras and the question was—did the illegitimate son of a Sudra succeed as heir jointly with his brother on the death of the father, so as to let in the doctrine of survivorship among them? The law governing the family was the Hindu Mitkashara law. A decision of (the late) Mr. Justice Haridas, reported in the 4th volume of the Indian Appeals, Bombay series, was approved of by Sir Michael Westropp and was followed, in this case, by the High Court of Calcutta. Their lordships of the Privy Council in their decision approved of that ruling of Mr. Haridas and have held, in accordance therewith, that the illegitimate Nitjanand Mansing succeeds to the gaddi of the Raj, which is an impartible one, that is, held by one member at a time. The lawyers amongst your readers will note this case with much interest as the decision is one that no doubt conflicts with general opinion in Bengal; but it appears the Bombay men were right once more."

How so? Because the British Judges up to the Privy Council have come to a particular view of Sastra?

A PARSEE merchant of Karachi is probably the greatest Globe-trotter among our countrymen. His name is Jehangir H. Kothari, and he has lately returned to Bombay from his second tour round the world, after having traversed 55,278 miles including sea voyages of a total of 15½ months' duration, 12,170 miles by railway and 400 miles in diligences and on foot.

THE Times of India's English sporting correspondent lately gave some particulars of a curious monument at Marlborough, saying:—

"A woman was selling stale fish on the spot where that monument stands, and, on the freshness of her wares being doubted, she declared that God might strike her dead if her fish were not caught the day before. She fell down dead, on the spot, and that monument bears witness to it. Bradlaugh, on the other hand, has been known to take that oath frequently, and at the risk of being guilty of a digression, the following incident is, I think, worth quoting of him, though his Congress admirers may not perhaps know it. At an atheistic address in Scotland he was, as was his custom then, enforcing his belief in there being no God by pulling out his watch and saying, 'If there be a God, let him strike me dead within a minute.' Whereupon a burly Scotchman leapt up to the platform and broke the spell by saying, 'The gude God would no trouble himself to strike a pair worm like thee, but he hath deputed his humble servant to do it in his stead! And he forthwith did.'"

Upon this the Morning Post:—

"This is no new statement concerning Mr. Bradlaugh, except that the 'burly Scotchman' is thrown in for dramatic effect. The member for Northampton has repeatedly denied the correctness of the story, and if we mistake not has on one occasion criminally prosecuted a clergyman for making it the basis of a bitter personal attack. Such a Bombastes Furioso attitude is very incompatible with Mr. Bradlaugh's usual habit, and we may remark en passant that he must have been a very 'burly Scotchman' indeed who ventured to hit a stalwart Briton who required the services of a dozen policemen to illegally expel him from the House of Commons. The whole story is an undoubted lie and the responsible authorities in the Times of India office must have known this."

That's strong language, but if the Post is right, as we suppose, in its facts, it is not too much for the occasion.

We are curious about the monument at Marlborough. Is there such a monument and for commemorating such an accident?

THE following appears in the Sheffield Independent:—

"Things in India are better now than they used to be within the memory of natives of the present generation. The poor Indian cannot now be kicked and cuffed with impunity as was the daily habit of the lordly Englishman at a date long subsequent to that at which Jos. Sedley was a collector. When I was in India only five years ago I saw in one of the principal hotels frequented by the dominant race printed appeals on the walls of the dining-room and smoking-room begging guests not to ill-treat native servants! This little placard incidentally threw a flood of light on the relations between the English residents and the natives of India."

JEVES' Disinfectants are making their way into official favor. They are already recognised for Her Majesty's Board of Trade, Marine Department, both for Merchant and Passenger ships, and the North Atlantic Steam ships. The Indian Governments too have accepted them as indispensable medical stores under the Indian Emigration and Colonial Emigration Acts. The latest recognition is by the Officer administering the Government of the Colony of Hongkong and its Dependencies. By a notification in the Hongkong Government Gazette, dated Victoria, Saturday the 22nd March 1890, His Excellency Francis Fleming "proclaims and declares that the scale of medicines and medical comforts.....be further altered by the addition thereto of the disinfectant known as Jeyes' Disinfecting Fluid."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Ministry is weary of Obstruction from the Opposition. On the 11th, the leaders of the Conservative party met at the Carlton Club to consider the matter when several propositions were made—to alter the rules of debate, to drop some Bills in the ministerial programme or to hold an Autumn Session of Parliament. Nothing definite was decided upon pending reconsideration of the subject. There was to be a meeting yesterday of Liberal-Unionists under the presidency of Lord Hartington.

THERE is friction again between Mr. Matthews, the Home Secretary, and Mr. Monro, the Head of the London Police. The Commissioner drew up a scheme for pensions for the Police force which the Secretary would not support. They, however, fell out on the appointment to the Assistant Commissionership rendered vacant by the death of Colonel Pearson. Mr. Matthews, ignoring the nomination by Mr. Monro, appointed his own Secretary glorying in the voluminous name of Evelyn J. Ruggles Brise to the post. This Mr. Monro seriously resented and, by way of giving point to his point, resigned his own appointment.

LIEUTENANT De Vismes De Ponthieu, Bombay Staff Corps, has been charged at the Westminster Police Court with causing, in complicity with a Belgian doctor, the death of the wife of a Barrister—Hall by name—by attempting to cause abortion. The wife had been living separate from the husband.

CYCLONES and floods are the order of the day in America. Terrible fires are now reported from Russia. A St. Petersburg telegram of the 11th inst. speaks of whole villages being destroyed in the Ural mining districts. Forty lives have been lost and 20,000 persons rendered homeless.

THE American Senate having referred the Caucus Silver Bill to the Finance Committee, that body have reported unfavorably on it. They do not approve of the proposal to issue silver certificates as legal tender or to redeem the certificates in bullion on demand or at the option of the Secretary to the Treasury. They also report against the bullion redemption clause and free coinage on certain conditions. The measure when passed is to come into force after a month and to continue for ten years.

EUROPE is Peace and Good will. In the Austrian Reichsrath, on the 10th instant, Baron Bauer announced that it would be necessary to increase the army next year in the interest of peace. The same day, in the German Reichstag, General Caprivi declared that the relations between France and Germany had recently much improved. But the Germanisation of Alsace could not, he said, be retarded by the cancellation of the passport rules. According to Count Kalnoky, the Triple Alliance was never more clear or sincere. Although relations with Serbia were less friendly, those with Bulgaria were being steadily consolidated.

THE Italian Heir-Apparent, Prince Victor Emmanuel, has arrived in Berlin and been received with royal honors.

MAJOR Wissman has reached Cairo on his way to Berlin. He is sure to be the African "lion" at that capital as is Mr. Stanley in London. The Major wonders at the attitude taken up by the great American on the German policy in East Africa. In the meantime, Mr. Stanley's protests have not been in vain. Sir James Fergusson answered in the Lower House that negotiations between Great Britain and Germany were pending and the status quo in Africa would be maintained. Germany has given her word to respect the treaties of 1886 and 1887 respecting the possessions of the British and German East Africa Companies.

NOTWITHSTANDING the progress towards emancipation of women, the British Upper House is not prepared yet to accept them for County Councils. The Lords have rejected by a majority of seventy votes the Bill on that behalf.

MISS Philippa Fawcett, daughter of the late Professor, has proved the superiority of woman over man even in Mathematics. She has obtained more marks than any Senior Wrangler in the Cambridge Mathematical Tripos. Since Mary Somerville, there has not probably been in the British Islands such a woman of science.

THE discovery of the Nihilistic plot in Paris has been followed by numerous suicides in various parts of Russia. At least, the Russian Police connect them as cause and effect. In course of investigating the suicide of a student of St. Petersburg, the Police have chanced upon another extensive conspiracy to murder the Czar. Truly, the Czar is to be pitied.

THE Secretary of State for India is not convinced that the people of Cashmere long for the restoration of their ruler or the cessation of British interference in the Unhappy Valley.

THERE was a disturbance of harmony among the members of the British Cabinet. Led by Mr. W. H. Smith, some of them proposed to shelve the Irish Land Bill. This was too much for the Irish Secretary, and Mr. Balfour threatened to resign. To restore peace, Lord Salisbury called a special meeting of the Council, whereat it was decided not only to retain the Irish Bill but to place it on the top of the programme relegating the Licensing Bill to the bottom. The leader of the House has, in consequence, betaken himself to the pouting-place. Mr. Smith says he is sick—as he well may be—and keeps himself away from the House.

MEETINGS of thousands have been held at Hyde Park to protest against the clauses of the Licensing Bill granting compensation to publicans. The proceedings were orderly so far that there was no charge by the Police and the military were not called out. General Allan and Mr. Monro were mobbed and hooted but not injured.

THE Indian Congress in England has secured the sympathy of the G. O. M. That is something, though it would have been more to their purpose if Mr. Gladstone had been in power. Mr. Gladstone received the delegates in his private room at the House of Commons. He was at one with the Congress in demanding the elective principle in the Councils Bill and wondered why it was not granted when more than one Viceroy had recommended it. He dismissed the deputation with the consolation that former ministries were more favorable to India than the one now in office.

ON Monday, the 19th May, at the Westminster Town-hall, the East India Association held a meeting. It was presided over by our ex-Viceroy the Marquis of Ripon. Mr. Reynolds, ex-member of the Bengal Board of Revenue and of the Supreme Legislative Council of India, read a paper on "Some Results of the Permanent Settlement." Mr. Reynolds is unquestionably a competent authority on the subject, and we accordingly quote his views:—

"The lecturer said that at the late meeting of the Indian Congress in Bombay it was resolved to petition the Government to extend to other parts of India the permanent settlement concluded 100 years ago by Lord Cornwallis for Bengal and Behar; but, he said, it did not seem likely that this request would meet with a favourable response. It was significant that the request should have been made, especially when the origin and composition of the body from which the request proceeded were taken into account. Consideration of the results of the settlement as a whole would lead to the conclusion that it was a wise and statesmanlike measure; that politically it had been a tower of strength to the Empire; that from a social and economic point of view it had stimulated the prosperity and fostered the intelligence of the Province of Bengal; and that, even from a strictly financial standpoint, the surrender of an increased land tax had been in some measure compensated by a steady development of other branches of the public revenue. The marvellous change which had transformed the aspect of the country was unquestionably due to the feeling of security produced by the permanent settlement, to the conviction that the worker would be left undisturbed to reap the labour of his hands, and would not be compelled to share with the State the fruits of the prosperity he had created. The settlement, withal, had resulted in making Bengal the most loyal province of the Empire; it had bound up, as nothing else could do, the interest of the people with the stability of the Government. The effect of the settlement had been to facilitate the transfer of the ownership of land to those who were likely to turn it to the best advantage, to extinguish the village accountant, and to create and foster the growth of a middle class in Bengal. Results like these should induce those to pause who condemned Lord Cornwallis as having squandered the resources of the State by misplaced liberality to the zemindars of Bengal. The experience of a century had shown that in Bengal the Government was not a loser by limiting its demand upon the land, while its adoption of this policy brought with it a train of public benefits; and, therefore, he suggested that the principle of the permanent settlement should be extended to the zemindars of Orissa and to the talookdars of the Government estates in Chittagong."

That is testimony of the highest, coming as it does from a retired Lower Provinces Civilian of the highest culture, probity, devotion to public duty, and long experience, who held the highest office in the Land administration, who stooped to flatter no man, and whom the Bengal Zemindars so misunderstood, thinking him their enemy, that they stood aloof from the public demonstration held in his honour before his final departure from the country. We hope Sir Stuart Bayley will earnestly consider Mr. Reynolds's advice to extend the Permanent Settlement to Orissa.

THE memorial of the residential house-owners and bustee proprietors in Calcutta for amendment of the municipal law for relief from the new burdens imposed on them, has met with no better fate than that of the agitation on it during the progress of the Bill through the Bengal Legislative Council. True, the Bengal Government does not summarily dispose of the matter. It has indeed given the subject the dignity of a Gazette publication, recognizing some of the signatories to the memorial as "the most distinguished and influential citizens of Calcutta." But all for nothing. The author of the measure was allowed to argue down the signatories. The memorial was subjected to the ruthless criticism of the able and accomplished Knight-errant, and the memorialists, as suggested by Sir Henry Harrison, are asked to wait till the whole of Calcutta has been reassessed. Sir Steuart Bayley has no other words for the plaintive cry of native Calcutta than those of the late Chairman of the Corporation, who, in his capacity of a member of Council, while disposed to give partial relief to the White Town or occupiers of rented houses, was determined to raise an additional income, for reclamation of the new Suburban Calcutta, from the Black Town or resident house-owners. The gubernatorial reply amounts to—You have been hitherto underassessed and you must now make up for past omissions and at once. Whatever the propriety of fixing upon the residential house-owners and bustee-proprietors for the additional ways and means, the measure that raises the assessment of houses by leaps and bounds can have no justification in any system of administration, unless it were general in times of danger and distress, say, during a patriotic war.

It is significant that, while the Local Government persistently insists on percentage of cost of building and value of land as the only true datum for municipal assessment, the Supreme Government recognizes only the standard of letting-value of houses for its purposes of taxation. In the new rules under the Income Tax Act, one of the instructions to Collectors is:—

Hitherto, we believe, Mr. Kilby has accepted the municipal assessment of residential houses in Calcutta for assessing the income tax. He must now follow a different procedure of his own to the worry and annoyance of house-owners. He cannot easily give up the new and higher municipal assessments. This difference of standards of assessment introduces a new element of discontent in Calcutta.

WE are surprised at the taste of the English journals, both in Great Britain and in India, which are publishing a news-paragraph headed "The Queen and the Bear," meaning by "The Queen" our Sovereign Lady. Surely, the good sense of the loyal conductors ought to have warned them of the impropriety, in the brief heading, of associating, without a word of explanation, the Royal and Imperial Lady and the hideous brute. The paragraph, however, gives a not uninteresting incident of the Queen's drive on Saturday afternoon, the 3rd May, communicated by a Windsor correspondent:—

"Upon reaching the road which intersects the Long walk near the Prince Consort's farm, about a quarter-past six o'clock, Her Majesty and Prince Albert Victor of Wales saw two foreigners with a brown bear resting under the shade of the old elms in the avenue. The Queen ordered her carriage to be stopped, and the men were requested to allow the bear to give a performance. This command was at once obeyed, the animal dancing with stick in its paws, on the green-sward and occasionally hugging its keeper, much to the amusement of the Royal party, who laughed heartily at its antics. At the finish Her Majesty gave the men some money. The bear-owners, who were greatly delighted with the honour conferred upon them as well as with the Royal largesse, refreshed themselves after the Queen's departure with ginger-beer and lemonade, and the animal was rewarded with a biscuit or two from the stall near the scene of the incident. The Queen was so charmed with Bruin that he was invited to the castle on Monday (the 5th May)."

We wish Her Majesty, besides giving money to the men, had ordered a dinner for the chief "caterer" of amusement to the royal party. These men are frequently the worse brutes, not only beating their bread-winner mercilessly on every occasion and no occasion, but also going the length of starving poor Bruin. To us, we confess, the most satisfactory part of the account is that in which we are told that the bear too got a crumb or two from the stall. We hope those who order these shows of our dumb brethren will make a point of giving some little refreshments to the bear or monkey, before their eyes, before dismissing the party. We can assure them of the best enjoyment. To those to whom the tricks of trained bears and monkeys are stale, it is the better enjoyment to have an opportunity of putting some pence in the pockets of the poor showmen and giving a feed to their dumb but interesting friend and companion. Sterne as Tristram Shandy, having crowned his good Samaritan's talk with his immortal overlaid donkey by giving his worthy chance acquaintance a macaroni, speaks apologetically of the conceit of seeing an ass eat macaroni as his governing motive in the act. It is all bosh, of course—a mere amiable self-depreciation of a soul overflowing with the milk of human kindness which shrinks from a harsh world's suspicion of a false—at least a maudlin—sentiment in himself. It was a genuine and sacred sentiment, as the universal heart of unsophisticated humanity will testify, from the depths of individual consciousness. Let any honest soul try the effect of a toothsome vegetable or some good fruit upon one of these dumb but feeling creatures. It will do both good—good to the beholders likewise—good to all.

LAST week, the Municipal Commissioners were chiefly occupied with a privy, and this week with a hanging verandah. The Health Officer had ordered the destruction of the first and would not grant permission for the second. The Commissioners, however, overruled their Officer of Health in both. These personal matters are somehow calculated to draw large houses and the Commissioners mustered in strong force. In the privy business, Dr. Simpson was reminded that he should not travel beyond bald facts in his reports, or make remarks on the action of the Commissioners. On the verandah question, the doctor Commissioners were divided. While Dr. McLeod strongly denounced the contemplated projection as most unhealthy to the neighbourhood, Dr. Sanders voted for its sanction.

THE subject of Hindu marriages is, we see, under discussion in the Indian press, native and European. The writers are occupied with the difficulty of Hindu families in giving their daughters in marriage from the extravagant demands made by, or for, boys, specially such as have any educational pretensions. That difficulty we are disposed to regard with despair. But there are other evils, in connection with our marriages which, though of a minor class, are harassing enough, and yet open to easy correction. Accordingly, we think it more profitable to expose them. The Madras Letter in the Tanjore Southern Star of the 7th June touches on one of them in the following:—

"This is the season for Hindu marriages. If one holds a respectable position, if his name is in some Almanac, he is quite flooded with printed invitations, no matter if he were not even an acquaintance. I am not opposed to humanity rejoicing in the joys of others, but if one wishes to treat these invitations in an earnest fashion, he shall have nothing else to do, but going the round to the houses of those persons who wish the gratification of seeing the greatest possible number of painted coaches, stately horses, and dazzling livery stand in front of their houses."

The writer does not seem to be conscious that he has quietly told the public of his own "painted coaches, stately horses, and dazzling livery" of his retainers. With respect to the social question of attendance at weddings and marriage ceremonies and assemblies among the natives of India, the custom in Lower Bengal is, we do not say worse but, far more exacting. Had its incidence been confined to the owners of gilded equipages and masters of liveried menials, we would not have cared. Such lucky folks are generally masters of their time, and are frequently oppressed with leisure, while their lapses too are readily pardoned by an obliging community. As for the cost—the drain of £. s. d. literally—the rich always manage matters cheap. As a fact, the rich and poor alike are indiscriminately summoned to our marriages—only strangers escape. When we remind the reader how multitudinous is the circle of near relationship and lively acquaintance of every one of us, and how every boy and every girl among us must marry as a rule, and have always a family besides, if possible and as soon as possible—necessitating, in many cases, repetition of marriage, in consequence—he will be able to form a tolerable idea of the extent and onerousness of the obligation imposed upon the members of our community and specially on the heads of households and families and of separate sections of families, by the frequency of these marriage invitations. These heads of poor households have usually little time to spare, being often the only bread-winners for a group of men, women and children. Here, as in Madras and indeed throughout all Hindudom, there are seasons for marriage.

At such times, the cry of marriage is heard on all sides; the air is laden with the noise of wedding preparations and wedding parties. Besieged with calls from various quarters, the poor Hindu is reduced to a far worse plight than that of the ass between two stacks of hay. The Hindu has not two but fifty stacks presented before him, and he has not the right of choice of the ass. He must do justice to all, by himself or by proxy, even at the cost of his and his people's health. Then, there are three different invitations on three different dates from a bridegroom's house and two invitations on separate days to a bride's. Last not least, it is not enough to make time and sacrifice convenience and comfort for attendance. You are required to send a present of sweetmeats and some apparel on the occasion of the ante-nuptial dinner and pay at least a Rupee nuzzar to the bride for the honour of beholding her unveiled face on the day of the post-nuptial feast. What a terrible season must every marriage season be to most Hindus! it may now be imagined. We have known respectable men condemned to struggle with a family on a small income, spending their whole month's pay in a single week.

The writer adds :—

"The Comaties are most mad after processions. Even a trifling incident gives rise to one. These processions are very gaudy and consist of carriages, palanquins, horses with riders, other emblems and a dancing girl, bedecked with jewels and flowers, marched with native bands and music playing. The streets are blocked at night by lengthy processions. Old, simple and frugal modes of living are forsaken and there is a wide departure from the traditions of ages in the habits and customs of Comaties. It is one of such processions that raised the first smoke of quarrel between the Mahomedans of the Godown Street and the Comaties, which ended in a blaze in a few months of that time and led to the conviction of a good number of Mussulmans."

What is the social standing of the Comaties, and what is their original profession and the occupation of most of them at present? We hope our contemporary or his correspondent will tell us, to enable us to compare them with their analogue here.

THE Cochin Argus is not among our exchanges. It is a contemporary for a' that, and of course a brother. Accordingly, we have much pleasure in acceding to its request, although that request reaches us second-hand, to publish its latest business notice, which is as follows :—

"We would kindly ask our subscribers, and in particular our contemporaries to give publicity to our reduced rates. In order to place the Cochin Argus within the reach of every body we have reduced our terms of subscription to Rs. 6 per annum, exclusive of postage for those whose salary is only Rs. 100 and below—a full year's subscription being paid in advance. We hope that the general public will not fail to take advantage of our present terms."

We hope too, with all our heart, but scarcely expect. In India, as a rule, those who pay, pay, and don't particularly mind a few Rupees more or less. Those who don't, don't. They beg, borrow, steal, rather than pay for their paper. Many of them are otherwise respectable people. Some are voracious readers and really enjoy their reading and admire their journal, only they cannot draw on their purse in proof of their appreciation. It is not their nature. Such anomalies are truly to be pitied. In such a country, the prospects of journalism may be imagined.

THE Lotos is no ordinary fruit. The noble Laureate has minutely described its physiological effects on the fortunate or unfortunate eaters. Is there anything peculiar in the Lotos of the Himalayas at Simla? It promotes, we know, "Exod"ation and, shall we say, Hibernation in summer. But now it would seem as if it leads to Hibernianization. Out of the Green Island, it were difficult to imagine such a project seriously made as is attributed to the Simla authorities. We read that "An attempt is likely to be made to reduce the number of indigent Indians in the Simla Hills by levying a tax on 'all those who could prove no visible means of existence.'"

Capital! If the beggars cannot pay, Down with the beggars! Draggon them down the Hills! Paradise has no room for poverty. They are incompatibles. Misery can only be an impertinent intrusion on the happy scene. As for charity, the Immortals do not, like mortals, need the exercise of it for their salvation by establishing thereby a claim on the Divine Mercy. If the beggars, by hook or by crook, by begging, borrowing, stealing, can pay, that's not bad—it is something—nay, so much the better, from a fiscal point. Humanity being simply a degradation for gods, no more splendid idea has, it must be conceded, ever been conceived than this of taxing paupers. The author ought to be forthwith made a G. C. S. I. If he can raise a revenue on absolute poverty, he can doubtless perform the miracle of making a silk purse out of a sow's ear. Brick-making without straw is nothing to him.

MR. T. E. Coxhead, of Her Majesty's Bengal Civil Service, had applied for permission to retire from the first July 1890. But before the permission could be Gazetted, he retired from the world for good on the 5th June last, under call from a higher Power. That permission we now find Gazetted on the 7th, under orders of the 5th June. He died at Darjeeling and was buried the next day, the Lieutenant-Governor attending. All that is born of woman shall die, and as the origin of gods individually is not in manner different from that of men, they too are not exempt from the common lot of creatures. Nevertheless, a god's a god for a' that. And doubtless all the divine brotherhood of both the Greater Olympus and the Lesser were on tip toe pensively watching the struggle with the grim King of Terrors of one of themselves. Under any circumstances, in a small place like Darjeeling, the critical condition of such a man would be known to everybody, and the élite of the European community in especial would, one and all, keep themselves informed from hour to hour of the progress of the illness. Nevertheless, while Mr. Coxhead lay gasping or lifeless on the bed of death, on Thursday se'nnight, the Government of India, who were within half an hour's telegraphic distance, were quietly passing orders on his application for retirement and granting the permission sought. Two days afterwards, when he was a day old in the grave, their gracious permission to him was authoritatively announced for what it might be worth to his ghost and to the world.

WE read the following in the Pioneer's news column :—

"The suggestion has been made by somebody in Bengal that the best thing whereby to protect the head against the sun is not a solah hat, but a large plantain leaf worn as a hat. It is contended that it will be a capital head-dress, and cheap. For the rest of the costume a belt of plantain fruit round the waist would be equally appropriate."

We don't know the quarter from which our contemporary's Sub derived that really fine suggestion—perhaps from the Patrika. It is of a piece with the grotesque wit with which our Bengali brother occasionally enlivens and instructs his readers. But the slow Briton does not catch the meaning. Is there anything more hideous than the all-round sola topee—or solar hat—which Europeans wear and doubtless find most convenient? To the native, it suggests the Bengali coolie's head-dress—the palm hat. The European is doubtless reminded of a dish-cover with the handle broken. Surely, a banana leaf or a man leaf would be equally to the purpose—a great deal more cool—and more æsthetic.

ON the 15th July next, at Calcutta, Sir Steuart Bayley will hold a Durbar for investiture of titles granted on the New Year's Day and the last Birthday of Her Majesty to mark Bengal's loyalty.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 14, 1890.

WARBURTON WARNED & DISCHARGED.

THE PUNJAB RESOLUTION ON THE AMRITSAR POLICE. THE letter of the Punjab Government on the Amritsar Police does not certainly err on the side of severity. The proceedings of Mr. Warburton, District Superintendent, were simply disgraceful. Fired with a zeal for ideally perfect registers of convicts and bad characters, he went to work in a way which one would hardly expect from a British officer. He constituted himself above law, above all propriety and public decency, and issued instructions to his subordinates to hunt up and assemble at central places, not merely habitual offenders, but every person, however long ago he might have been convicted, or however trivial might have been the offence—and this for holding a most annoying and degrading examination of the person of every male and female offender for the revision of his descriptive rolls. Nothing could be more illegal, more arbitrary, more tyrannical than this. As observed in the Government letter, no discrimination was shown between regular bad characters and the most inoffensive and at present respectable persons who may have once been convicted of crimes not sufficiently serious to require their record in the police registers. Such were Mr. Warburton's proceedings. To what frightful abuse of power in the hands of the lower officers of the department they tended may well be imagined. It was a reign of terror, and no man or woman's dignity was safe. A severe reprimand is by no means too harsh a punishment for an offence of such gravity. For the rest, the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab deals with the case in a considerate and impartial way. His judgment is delivered in the following words:—

"The Deputy Commissioner and Commissioner, the Deputy Inspector-General of Police and yourself (Inspector-General of Police) all assert unhesitatingly that Mr. Warburton's motives were merely zeal for carrying out what he considered to be orders received, and anxiety to correct his registers and improve his power of surveillance over bad characters. The Lieutenant-Governor accepts this view with confidence on their and your authority, and because it agrees with his own knowledge of Mr. Warburton's conduct and character, and is confirmed by non-official opinions which His Honor considers reliable. But the absence of bad motives does not excuse Mr. Warburton's failure to foresee or to attach proper importance to the annoyance and injury which his instructions were likely to cause to many people who, though not of stainless character, are entitled to the full protection of the law, and, as a policeman, he was bound to know what his legal powers were, and as his instructions exceeded them, it is no excuse that he overlooked the fact. It may no doubt be true that there is an old custom or tradition in the Punjab dating from the early years of our administration, whereby the police assume the authority to call up or collect on occasions for departmental purposes persons supposed to be convicted offenders or bad characters, but His Honor believes that this has never been exercised with the want of discretion and discrimination revealed by these Amritsar proceedings, and all intelligent officers must have long known that the procedure was illegal if it involved any compulsion. Mr. Warburton may have been blinded to the illegality of his proceedings by his familiarity with such old customs of the department in its earlier stages, but this, though some extenuation, is no real excuse. Mr. Warburton seems also in his proceedings to have entirely overlooked the fact, that by the Police Rules, Registers V and IX which he was revising as well as Register X are confidential documents. The Lieutenant-Governor, therefore, directs that he be severely reprimanded for his proceedings, which have brought discredit on the department to which he has the honour to belong. On the subject of Mr. Warburton's indebtedness, and the further action which the Lieutenant-Governor may be compelled to take in his case, you will be addressed separately. A copy of this letter will also be sent to the District Magistrate through the Commissioner of the Division for information, and it will be intimated that, though it appears that no complaints were made to him, yet the Lieutenant-Governor considers that it is not altogether creditable to his hold on his district and control of the police as district magistrate that he did not know all that was going on. It is true that the Tribune has greatly exaggerated the annoyance inflicted and the excitement aroused by these proceedings, but there was enough to have come to the ears of a district magistrate known to be prepared to check the police as well as to support them."

Sir J. B. Lyall may wonder how orders characterised by such moderation and so entirely free from the least suspicion of passion, could have given umbrage in any quarter. He may well be amazed and bewildered if told that no quarter is free from umbrage. Such indeed is the fact. Dissatisfaction is universal. The Anglo-Indian press has nothing but ridicule and sneer for the letter. The native press, on the contrary, complains of the inadequacy of the punishment. The differences of the two sections of public opinion are evidently growing more and more irreconcilable. This is much to be regretted. And we see no hope of remedy so long as one side will never admit the truth against a brother White, and the other will always go on aggravating ills and throwing itself into hysterics on every occasion. But this unanimity of discontent with so well conceived and well reasoned a document is not to be explained by the antagonism between natives and Europeans. It is the well-merited fate of all trimming and all political jugglery. Running with the hare and hunting with the hound may, from a worldly point, be a desirable policy, but it never pays. They who try to please everybody usually end in pleasing nobody. The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab appears in that letter a fine amiable gentleman, but he carries his amiability too far, we are afraid. Statesmanship requires a backbone—it is not a simple rôle of indiscriminate conciliation all round. We are simply disgusted at the utter inadequacy of the punishment. We call it punishment by courtesy. The Punjab Government are so fond of their dear Police as to spare them the slightest pinch. Warburton does not receive even a nominal punishment. It is only a sentence of "warned and discharged" that has been pronounced on him. Such a ridiculous award in so grave a case—its gravity fully admitted—is an outrage on the Punjab people and a trifling with the public of the Empire at large.

Our contemporary the Tribune has been complimented in the Government letter in the following terms:—

"Mr. Warburton's own orders thus make any further inquiry unnecessary, and show that the proceedings taken by the Amritsar Police deserve all the subsequent abuse of the Tribune; and though that paper has, as usual, indulged in exaggerations and in libellous attribution of bad motives to Mr. Warburton, yet the Lieutenant-Governor is compelled to hold it has done a public service by the exposure which will make such things impossible in future."

We congratulate our contemporary on this authoritative vindication of its conduct. The compliment is indeed qualified with reservation, but what journalist in such circumstances will ever be cordially recognised by official men?

It is something, at any rate, to have wrung that certificate. We say wrung, advisedly—on the admission of Sir J. B. Lyall himself. "The Lieutenant-Governor is compelled to hold it (the Tribune) has done a public service by the exposure which will make such things impossible in future," says the Chief Secretary. No journalist in India has ever received such an official recognition of any service, and no Government has ever paid such a testimony to the power of the press. After that, the carping at the "usual exaggerations" of the journal and "its libellous attribution of bad motives to Mr. Warburton" is not in keeping, and only shows want of firmness in the inditing pen. If, notwithstanding the "usual" character of the journal, or at least notwithstanding the prejudice of Government against it, "the Lieutenant-Governor is compelled to" bow to it, that is no ordinary victory. It shows how official forces were all arrayed and determined to support the accused Police and show up the Tribune and blow up its broad based and huge pile of facts. It shows how Government went into the consideration of the matter with a prepossession in favor of Warburton—how they would have been glad to find that the Tribune was no better than it should be—a vile native print, edited by, of all nuisances on earth, the Baboo, "usually" dealing in "exaggeration and libellous attribution of motives" against officials and Europeans, possibly also a seditious rag, whose function is to set the people against the British Power. But there was no help for it—the Lieutenant-Governor was compelled to hold otherwise and make a low, if not a gracious, bow to the cantankerous Baboo.

What a pity the Lieutenant Governor is "compelled" to do a simple act of justice. Why cannot our rulers cordially do it—their absolute duty? When will the man arise among them who will be delighted to hold that a newspaper has done a public service which will prevent the recurrence of such things as the doings of the Amritsar Police? Is that small service? What more do Governments do? What can the most successful administration do? To prevent the recurrence of offences is as much as any Government can attempt or hope to achieve. But grant it is small service—what more can be expected from poor native journalists, despised and suspected as they are? Yes, it is entirely honorary service to the state by men who, so far from being honored, are treated with scant courtesy by Government and officials. It becomes the drawers of fat pay to receive our gift of a country tat with thanks as if it were a high-bred young steed, without a too close scrutiny. Small service indeed! Be it so.

Small service is true service while it lasts;
Of friends, however humble, scorn not one;
The daisy, by the shadow that it casts,
Protects the lingering dew-drop from the sun.

/THE FENIAN BABOO—A BOGUS BOGIE.

We rejoice to see that our contemporary the Editor of Hope has vindicated himself from the charge of seditious publicly preferred against him by no less a man than Mr. W. Digby. Baboo Amrita Lal Roy has indited a long, luminous, transparent and thoroughly satisfactory explanation. We extract the cream of it:—

"I was a student in the colleges of Calcutta between the years 1874 and 1879, when Babu Surendra Nath Banerji was in the heyday of his glory as an orator, having come upon the young men of the time as a novelty in India's political firmament and being looked upon by them as the Coming Man thrown out of the Civil Service to avenge the country's wrongs and lead it out of the galling fetters of an alien despotism. Many Calcutta students of the time I refer to will confess with shame the influence that the captivating declaimer acquired over their susceptible hearts, and how they regarded him as a possible Mazzini, Kossuth, or Garibaldi, heroes upon whose exploits he was so fond of lecturing. Nor was the rising tribune at all anxious to discourage the delusion of his youthful admirers or rather worshippers, among whom I had the misfortune to be one. Indeed, it is a well-known fact that playing at Mazzini was Babu Surendra Nath Banerji's favourite rôle in the early part of his career as a public speaker, and oftentimes he would be heard to say that with the help of students he could accomplish anything. I do not mean, nor do I believe now, that Babu Surendra Nath would really have ever followed in the footsteps of his Italian model even if he had the capacity for it, or if he could have retained the admiration and confidence of his school-boys beyond the thoughtless period of their lives; but what other effect could his speeches and bearing have upon impressionable and ardent young men than to fill their heads with all sorts of false notions about their duty to their country and vague ideas as to the ways of freeing it from an "alien despotism?"

I was never intimate with Babu Surendra Nath Banerji, though in the days I am speaking of I was fortunate enough, as I then thought, to come near him now and then and exchange a word or two with him at the end of a lecture. No wonder that with the superstitious regard I then entertained for him, along with other contemporary students, I should have bethought myself of him whenever any matter of importance had to be consulted upon. I have said in the first part of my "English and American Reminiscences" (p. 4) that my plan of visiting America was first formed when I was about seventeen or eighteen years old, and in the year 1877, when between eighteen and nineteen, I together with two fellow-students, who were to be my associates in the enterprise, had occasion to take advice from Babu Surendra Nath Banerji more than once. The object of our visit to America was to learn practical mechanics, paying special attention to military engineering and not failing to take one or more courses in army drill; and the two associates are living now, along with whom we discussed the matter over one night at Babu Surendra Nath's residence in Taltolla. We all deplored the condition to which India had been reduced under the "iron heels of despotism," &c., &c., and came to the conclusion that the remedy lay in our young men taking to such pursuits as I and my two friends were thinking of. Babu Surendra Nath said we had his hearty support in our undertaking, and even undertook to try if he could raise money to help us. I am quite ready to believe that he was not serious, and was talking in that reckless fashion in which he often speaks in public, regardless of the consequences of what he says; but so far as we were concerned the effect was the same as if he had been a real Mazzini in the flesh instead of the would-be author of the late Town Hall fiasco.

Of course, our project ended as such projects do and ought to end, namely, in nothing. It was about two years and a half after this interview that I left for England, in March 1880, and I arrived in America towards the end of 1882. My actual visit to those countries was undertaken for purposes very different from that of the one whose puerile project failed, but though more than six years had elapsed between the time of that project and the date (some time in 1884) when the letter which has called forth this explanation was written, the associations of my early youth had not altogether left me at the latter date. Indeed, there were circumstances in my American life which were calculated to re-awaken whatever vitality was left in those associations. I have explained in my "Three Years among the Americans" how the necessity of making my way in New York, without money and without friends, threw me into contact with all the numerous kinds of people of every nationality who congregate in that city—among others Russian Nihilists, German Socialists, and disaffected men of all sorts; and it was the most natural of things that I should have come to know some of the leaders of the Irish-Americans in a city which is peculiarly their own. The acquaintance did not come of seeking it for its own sake, but in the direct way of trying to find a livelihood for myself. It was in 1884, when I was making my living by writing, and the Irish World was one of the papers for which I wrote for a period of not more than three or four months. That paper being the leading organ of the Irish-Americans I could not but come across some of their principal men. Naturally the talk with them turned upon matters of Indian Government, and I gave ideas about it and of the popular feeling towards it that could be given by one whose best education in Indian politics had been derived from Babu Surendranath Banerji's fiery speeches and from newspapers whose contents led to the passing of the Vernacular Press Act. By a curious coincidence of circumstances, too, at the time I am speaking of the flame of the fierce Ilbert Bill controversy had not yet subsided in India and Babu Surendranath had just come out of prison as a hero and martyr. The Bengalee was one of the papers that used to be pretty regularly sent to me by friends at home, and my heart naturally throbbed in response to its appeals to the patriotism of its countrymen, while my admiration for the hero of my boyhood was increased. When therefore I was asked by some of the Irish-American gentlemen I came to know to sound the feelings of the leading patriots of my country, and to put them in mutual communication, what could be more natural for me than to open correspondence with the man who was said to have recently declared, when sentenced to imprisonment, that he would "shake the foundations of the British Government?" With the sort of political education I had had, and living far away from my country in circumstances calculated most to alienate my feelings from its Government, what could be expected of me at that time but that I should write a most silly letter to my quondam idol, ignorant alike that there were forms of patriotism which whatever their motive, were "treasonable" according to the law, and that even the "best" men of educated India, as understood at the present day, might take advantage of confidence reposed in them to serve their personal ends.

At this date I cannot recollect the contents of that letter, though I remember that it was written at a stage of mental development and political knowledge when I believed or rather fancied (for the word belief is not applicable in reference to such a state of mind) that the best remedy for Indian evils lay in the subversion of the British Government. I declare, however, with the same honesty and frankness with which I have always written since I learned to wield a pen, fearless of consequences whether from the displeasure of the Government or from the vindictiveness of my "patriotic" countrymen, that this incident of the letter was a single episode in my life having no relation of continuity with my future career, and that it was the result of the thoughtlessness of a moment, and not of deep deliberation, in a condition of life when even whatever judgment I might have had was kept in abeyance under the strange and exciting impressions which were taking hold of my mind every moment. Its value or valuelessness as having any relation to my present life may be judged from the fact that the letter was written nearly two years before even my much-talked-of article in the North American Review, whose sentiments I have declared more than once as representing an immature and experienced state of my intellect. I further declare that my connection with the Irish-Americans in any sense lasted only a few months, ceasing, as it had begun, with the necessity of making my way in a new walk of life, and that from a short while after the writing of the letter, in 1884, up till now I have had no intercourse, either by word or writing, with men of the Irish-American League, though nearly a year and a half of this period was spent in New York. If I had cared to mix myself up with the Irish-Americans in the sense in which "communication" with them is generally understood when the loyalty of a British subject is questioned, I could have had a most easy time of it in America instead of being driven to the necessity of carrying a prolonged struggle for my daily bread."

Mr. Roy not only defends himself but gives a homethrust to his enemy. Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee will now regret that he ever gave the editor of Hope such an opportunity.

THE INFLUENZA IN TIPPERAH.

SIR,—The Influenza epidemic has not spared Tipperah. Mr. L. Palit is said to have brought it here; so it must be afflicting the people for over six weeks. God be praised, that it has appeared in a mild form. But here it has a larger and wider range than elsewhere. Doctors aver that nearly 90 per cent. of the people at Comillah have suffered from its attack. This, however, may be an exaggeration. I myself can't and shan't give you the percentage. High fever, violent head-ache, acute muscular pains, prostration, cough due to tracheal and bronchial inflammation, inflammation of the throat and larynx and their glands, debility, loss of appetite and vertigo, seem to be the general symptoms here. Head-ache remains for some days after the fever has left. Catarrhal symptoms of the eyes and nose, drowsiness and delirium, nausea and bilious vomiting with the accompanying symptoms of the burning of the eyes, hands and feet, and diarrhæa are to be scarcely met with. Relapses are frequent. One very often hears from the mouth of the doctors themselves of the many cures they have effected. In fact, I am not aware of any case of Influenza turning out fatal. That Influenza does not kill is the common belief in the town. In some villages, fevers of various other types are carrying away a good many lives, and they are by the ignorant people in the country, I suspect, readily mistaken for the new fever—Influenza. In some villages, cholera has also entered appearance. The old people will tell you that while they were young they knew not even the names of so many diseases, for there were not as many. The good old times are gone. The present is more vicious than the past and the future will be still more. Hence these visitations.

INCOME TAX NOTIFICATION.

The 6th June, 1890.

No. 2762.—In exercise of the powers conferred by sections 6 and 38 of Act II of 1886, the Governor-General in Council is pleased, in supersession of previous Notifications,—

(A) to exempt from liability to the tax payable, and to assessment, under the said Act—

(1) the income of persons (other than persons in the service of the Government) residing in—

- (a) the scheduled districts of the Presidency of Madras;
- (b) the Hill Tracts of Chittagong;
- (c) the Mewas States under the Khandesh Political Agency;
- (d) the Khondmals and the Mahal of Angul in Orissa;

(2) the income of Universities or other associations or bodies existing solely for educational purposes, and of local authorities as defined in section 3 of the Act, provided that the exemption shall not extend to interest payable on a Government security in respect of any period (the period running to date of payment of interest from last date of payment thereof) during which a transfer of the security has been effected;

(3) the official allowance which an Agent of a Prince or State in India in alliance with Her Majesty, who has been duly accredited to represent the Prince or State for political purposes in any place within the limits of British India, receives as such Agent in British India from the Prince or State;

(4) any capital sum paid in commutation of the whole or a portion of a pension;

(5) so much of the income of a person as is derived solely and directly from the production of indigo or the preparation thereof for the market: provided that nothing in this clause shall be construed to affect section 5, sub-section (2), of the Act with respect to the liability of an officer or servant of a person to whom this clause applies;

(6) such portion of any person's income as is paid to any Service Fund, Mutual Benefit Fund, Friendly Society, or other legally established Association, not being a company within the meaning of section 3, sub-section (2), of the Act, in respect of an insurance or deferred annuity of his own life or on the life of his wife, in the same way as if the payment were made to an Insurance Company;

(7) such portion of the income of any person in the service of the Government, or of any Local Authority, or of any Railway Company, as is paid into any Provident Fund established under the authority, or with the permission, of the Government, and as is not repayable to him at his option so long as he remains in such service:

Provided that the amount of income exempted under No. (6) and No. (7), together with the amount exempted under section 5, sub-section (1), clause (g), of the Act, shall not exceed one-sixth of the whole income in respect of which the person would, but for these exemptions, be liable;

(8) Interest on securities which are held by, or are the property of, a Service Fund or a Friendly Society, as defined below:

For the purposes of this exemption, a Service Fund is a fund established under the authority, or with the permission, of Government for the purpose of securing deferred annuities to the subscribers, or payments to them in the event of their resignation or dismissal from the service in which they are employed, or provision for their wives or children after their death, or payments to their estate or their nominees upon their death, to which the servants of the Government, or of a Local Authority, or of a Railway Company, are alone admissible as subscribers or members, and the funds of which are either deposited with the Government or invested in Government Securities; and a Friendly Society is a Mutual Association established for the purpose of securing deferred annuities to the subscribers, or provision for their wives or children after their death, or payments to their estate or their nominees upon their death, and in which the payment which may be made in respect of any one nominee does not exceed either a single payment of Rs. 3,000 or an annual payment of Rs. 500.

Note.—The East Indian Railway Savings Bank shall be deemed to be a Service Fund within the meaning of this clause.

(B) to rule—

9 that a claim to exemption preferred under section 5, sub-section (1), clause (g), of the Act on that portion of income taxable under Part I of the second Schedule of the Act which is paid as a premium to an Insurance Company shall not be entertained if the claim is made after the expiration of six months from the last day of the financial year during which the premium was paid;

(10) that officers and men of the Indian Marine Service shall not for the purposes of section 5, sub-section (1), clause (i), of the Act be treated as belonging to Her Majesty's Indian Forces; and

(11) that for the purposes of the Act—

(a) the tentage allowance included in the pay and Indian allowances of an officer in military employ under Article 748 of the Army Regulations, India, Vol. I, Part I, shall be deemed to be salary, unless the officer has provided and has in his possession the camp equipage of his rank in a serviceable condition;

(b) the horse allowance shown as included in the consolidated or staff pay of the several appointments specified in Article 91 of the Army Regulations, India, Vol. I, Part I, shall be deemed to be salary, unless the officer has provided and actually maintains the number of bonâ fide chargers prescribed for his rank.

No. 2763.—In exercise of the powers conferred upon him by Act II of 1886, and of all other powers enabling him in this behalf, and in supersession of previous Notifications, the Governor-General in Council is pleased to make the following rules under the said Act:

1. The time within which amounts deducted from salary, annuity, pension, or gratuity paid by a Local Authority under section 8, sub-section (1), of the Act must be paid to the credit of the Government of India is fixed at one week from the date of payment of the salary, pension, annuity, or gratuity. The payment to the credit of the Government shall be made by remitting the amount to the Collector with a statement giving the following particulars for each person from whom the tax has been realised:

(1) Name. (2) Period for which the salary, pension, or annuity has been paid. (3) Amount of salary, pension, annuity, or gratuity paid. (4) Amount of tax.

2. The return required by section 10 of the Act shall be in Form A hereto appended.

The name of any person who is receiving, at the date of the return prescribed by section 10 of the Act, a salary, pension, or annuity which does not amount to Rs. 300 per annum, or has received during the year ending on that date a gratuity which does not amount to that sum, need not be shown in the return.

3. Any sums, such as payments to regimental mess or band funds or the like, compulsorily stopped from salary by the orders, or with the approval, of the Government, shall be deducted from the salary previous to assessment.

A portion of salary withheld in pursuance of an order of a Court is not a sum compulsorily stopped from salary within the meaning of this rule.

4. When a deduction is made from the amount of salary, pension, or annuity liable to assessment on account of a payment made to a Life Insurance Company, the sum deducted shall, if the premium is payable in sterling, be the actual cost of remittance as stated by the assessor; or, if the assessee is unable to state such actual cost, the equivalent in rupees of the sterling payment calculated at the official rate of exchange for the year in which the deduction is made.

5. A deduction such as is mentioned in the preceding rule must be supported either—

- (1) by the original receipt of the Insurance Company; or
- (2) (in the case of a deduction claimed by a servant of the Government or of a Local Authority) by a copy of the same presented, together with the original, to the officer who pays the salary, pension, or annuity, and attested by that officer, who should, after such attestation, return the original; or
- (3) by a duplicate receipt given by the Insurance Company; or
- (4) by a certificate of payment given by the Insurance Company.

In cases (1), (3), and (4), the receipt or certificate should be returned as soon as the fact of payment is admitted in the due course of audit.

Where the Collector is satisfied that none of the above prescribed documents can be produced without an amount of delay, expense, or inconvenience which, under the circumstances of the case, would be unreasonable, he may accept such other proof of payment of the premium as he may deem sufficient.

6. The amounts exempted from the tax by section 5, sub-section (1), clause (g), of the Act, and referred to in rule 4 of these rules, shall not be deducted from income for the purpose of determining whether the income is liable to the tax, or of determining under Part I of the second Schedule of the Act the rate at which the tax shall be levied.

7. The amount to be assessed under section 24, sub-section (1), of the Act on account of a building occupied by the owner thereof shall not in any case exceed 10 per cent. of the aggregate income of the owner derived from all sources. It must not, however, be understood from this that a maximum of 10 per cent. of the aggregate income of the owner is to be assumed in every case as equivalent to the letting-value of his house. The letting-value should in all cases be ascertained on the best data available in view of the circumstances of the locality in which the house is situated.

8. After the close of the year of assessment, each Accountant-General or other auditing officer shall submit Return No. 1, in the form hereto appended, to such officer as the Local Government may direct.

9. The certificates referred to in the second column of Part III of the second Schedule of the Act shall be in Form B or in Form C hereto appended.

10. Any claim under section 5, sub-section (1), clause (e), of the Act to exemption from the levy of the tax on the interest of securities employed solely for religious or public charitable purposes within the meaning of that clause must be supported by a certificate from the Collector, which shall be in Form D hereto appended.

11. In the case of securities the interest on which is payable by the Government of India, the amount deducted on account of the tax under section 13, sub-section (1), of the Act shall be paid to the credit of the Government on the same day as the payment of the interest is made.

12. In the case of securities the interest on which is not payable by the Government of India, the amount so deducted shall be paid to the credit of the Government within one week from the date on which interest is paid. The person deducting the amount should pay it to the credit of the Government by remitting the amount to the Collector, with a statement showing the following particulars:

(1) Name of owner. (2) Description of security. (3) Number of security. (4) Date of security. (5) Amount of security. (6) period for which interest is drawn. (7) Amount of interest. (8) Amount of tax.

13. After the close of the year of assessment, each Accountant-General and Comptroller shall submit Return No. II, in the form hereto appended, to such officer as the Local Government may direct.

14. In calculating the amount of tax payable, the amount due on a fraction of a rupee shall be neglected. Thus the tax to be realised on a monthly salary of Rs. 166-10-8 is Rs. 4-5-2 only.

15. All public servants are forbidden to make public or disclose, except for the purpose of the working of the Act, any information contained in documents delivered or produced with respect to assessments under Part IV of the second Schedule of the Act, and any public servant committing a breach of this rule shall be deemed to have committed an offence under section 166 of the Indian Penal Code.

All public servants are further enjoined to be most careful to regulate their proceedings as far as practicable in such manner as to prevent information which should be kept secret from becoming known. It should be noted that information of this nature is to be withheld by officers administering the Act from persons in the employment of assessors.

16. Power to make further rules is hereby delegated to the several Local Governments, and no rules already made by Local Governments, under authority given by the Governor-General in Council, shall be deemed to be cancelled by the supersession of any of the notifications quoted in the present Notification.

17. Each Local Government will prescribe forms of registers to be maintained by Collectors and others for the purpose of showing the demand and collections of the tax, the various classes of incomes assessed, and the working of the several provisions of the Act.

18. After the close of the year of assessment, each Local Government will submit to the Government of India in the Finance and Commerce Department a report on the working of the Act.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

EXPECTATION.

FROM THE FRENCH OF DELAVIGNE.

THE morn has chased the shades of night,
The streams grow bright beneath her eye;
A golden veil of purple light
Hangs o'er the rosy eastern sky.

To catch the sun's awakening rays
Upon the turf still wet with dew,
With trembling haste the rose displays
Her crimson chalice to the view.

A sweeter zephyr fills the place,
The birds in sweeter concert sing;
More closely in a fond embrace
Around the elm the vine doth cling.

Amid these shades so calm and still
All things partake of my delight—
Fresh turf, fair sky, transparent rill—
Ah! can you know she comes to-night?

THE ELFIN BRIDE.

FROM THE GERMAN OF DE LA MOTTE FOUQUE.

GAILY the sun ascends his throne,
And gilds the dewy sod below;
"O, youth! what chains thee to that stone,
Where cooling breezes blow?"

O, Mourner!—from the new-lit skies
The darksome gloom hath ta'en its flight:
Methinks no sleep has blest thine eyes
Through all this weary night!

And tears, thou valiant youth and true
Have fallen upon this humid stone;
Or is it but the nightly dew
That down from heaven hath flown?"

"The dew would show its wonted care,
And weep on my beloved stone;
But ah! the pearls that glisten there
Are but my tears alone!"

"A noble hero!—and in tears?
A brave young man—and weakly pine?
O come where gleams the sheen of spears,
And Love's warm glance divine!"

"Let others kneel at Beauty's throne,
Or up the gleaming falchion take;
For me—I tarry by this stone
Until my heart will break!"

"Oh! tell me, then, thy heart's deep woe—

"What sorrow chains thee to the stone?"

"Ah! yes, from lips the tale will flow,
That speak of this alone!—

Last night I crossed the mountain near,
And sought this verdant vale of rest;
A sweet voice whispered in mine ear—
A sweeter lip to mine was prest!—

It was a beauteous Fairy form,
That thus about the wanderer played,
And twined a garland bright and warm
Around us twain, that ne'er can fade.

She called me her beloved lord—
She called herself a wife's dear name;
And gave to me, with glad accord,
Her wondrous sweet and tender frame.

That moment did the Night withdraw
Her vaporous veil so dark and damp;
As through the roof of leaves we saw
The Moon suspend our nuptial lamp.

And as it paled before the day,
And sank amid the silent sea,
She reached her hand and cried—"Away!
Beloved, hence! from me!"

Hence!—hence!—for ere the sun has smiled,
I too must far from this have flown:
One beam on me, the Fairy Child,
Would turn me into stone.

For this, through Time's unnumbered years,
Has been the Sun's unquestioned right;
But till the morning-red appears,
The Fairy People rule the night!

Audacious boy! Oh! sad event!
I prayed, and kissed her thousand charms,
Until she, weeping, gave consent
To linger still within my arms.

But through her tears she sang this strain—
'Ah! many and many a happy night
Might I within thy arms have lain,
If thou didst not that promise blight.

•I cannot bring my lips to speak
Denial to that prayer of thine—
And see! upon the purple peak
The day begins to shine!

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Farewell, beloved murderer mine !
 Farewell ! thy claspings hands unbind !—
 Scarce shrieked I 'fly !' when came the Shine,
 When came the cooling morning wind.

There in my very hands she grew
 A lifeless stone, so hard and cold ;
 There from my heart the life-blood flew,
 And strength grew weak, and youth grew old.

A lifeless stone !—O bitter woe !
 My joy ! my grief ! my Elfin Bride !
 On this, through life, my tears shall flow—
 In death I'll sleep beside !"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE following neat epigram has appeared in England on the appointment of Lord Reay, G.C.I.E., late Governor of Bombay, as Knight Grand Commander of the Most Exalted Order of the Star of India :—
 Fit that a Queen, of India's realm possest,
 With India's "Mount of Light" upon her breast,
 Whom India's people honour and obey,
 Should add to India's Star another R(e)ay.

WE are glad to observe that a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals has been founded at Secunderabad. The advent of an enthusiastic surgeon like Mr. Lawrie ought to have been the signal for such a measure. Since the influence that he has acquired in the Hyderabad State, it had become imperative.

AT the last University Examinations, the Medical College has passed in the Preliminary Scientific M. B. Examination three students in the Second Division ; in the First M. B., one in the first and six in the second division ; in the Second M. B., one in the first and five in the second ; and in the M. D., one, namely, Niltatan Sarkar.

THE first spinning and weaving mill in the island of Ceylon has been started. The mill is already supplying local orders—grey sheeting, drills, and towelling of excellent quality.

THE American Silver Queen, Mrs. Mackay, residing in Paris, is said to own the finest jewels in the world. Among them is a sapphire bought from a Russian Prince worth £30,000, a necklace of pearls worth £20,000 and a pair of solitaires worth £85,000.

A FARMER named Thomas Morrison, near Shelburne, Ontario, lately took three of his five children from their beds and drowned them in a water barrel, their ages being two, five, and seven years respectively, and then himself took some carbolic acid. The poison was pumped out and Morrison rallied, but his recovery is regarded as doubtful. He is supposed to have been suffering from temporary insanity. His wife was absent on a visit to a sick sister.

IT is satisfactory to learn that the Government of India has ordered the Ordnance Department, Madras, to comply with the entire indent submitted by the Travancore State of arms and accoutrements, &c., for the use of the Nayar Brigade. Before Lord Dufferin struck out his policy of utilising the military materiel of the Native States, the Government of India used to be far too suspicious.

A CORRESPONDENT of the Ceylon Observer relates : One day, a lady, on returning from a drive, had the cushions of her carriage lifted to recover something she missed, when, to her horror, a huge cobra was discovered under one of them. The lady had been three hours in the carriage !

IT is sad to learn that three upcountry girls of the same village clubbed together to commit suicide. Laying themselves across the railway line near the Balpore station, they were run over by the night mail for Mokameh, and their heads entirely severed from their bodies.

What a visita of romance is opened to contemplation by this triplication of self-murder at the same moment and in the same place !

The short and simple annals of the poor are surely not all a humdrum monotone. There are incidents of pain and passion, known to the sympathetic observer. We are afraid there are general causes in operation in our society, pressing, perhaps, with undue severity, upon particular classes, goading them to deeds of desperation. As regards these country girls, we hope some gentlemen of the quarter will enquire

Into their mutiny
 Rash and undutiful,— how the poor things were,
 Mad from life's history,
 Glad to death's mystery
 Swift to be hurl'd—
 Any where, any where
 Out of the world !

THE Lieutenant-Governor has considerably ruled that a notice under section 17 of the Income-tax Act, II of 1886, shall be served on every person whose name is included for the first time in the list of persons chargeable under Part IV, or in whose case the amount of income-tax to be paid is enhanced.

IN supersession of the old rules of 1888, new rules coming into effect from the next month, have been made relating to Revenue-money-orders. They will be found in the Calcutta Gazette, Part I. of the 18th June 1890.

THE Government of India is still undecided as to its course in regard to the proposal of the Bombay Chamber of Commerce, supported by the Chambers of Madras and Bengal, that railway receipts should be declared to be transferable and negotiable instruments, carrying a title to property like bills of lading. Contrary opinion has been expressed in other quarters, and the Government of India is anxious to obtain further opinion on the subject. Accordingly, Local Governments and Administrations, and the Public Works and Legislative Departments have been addressed on the subject and the papers made public.

HER Majesty's Consul at Jeddah writes under date the 14th April, but appearing only this week in the Calcutta Gazette, that "all Indian pilgrims coming via Suez being considered as coming direct from India, unless they can show by their papers that they have been living in Egypt or other places in the north for sometime, are subjected to 10 days' quarantine in the island of Abu Saad in Jeddah harbour" Indian pilgrims are therefore warned that before their departure from Bombay they should have their passports viséd by Her Majesty's Consuls in those places through which they pass, in order to enable them to obtain free pratique on their arrival at Jeddah.

RAI Surruth Chunder Ghose Bahadr, Honorary Assistant Engineer, first grade, First Calcutta Division, has been in charge of the Calcutta Workshops Division since the afternoon of the 3rd February 1890, but this transfer is Gazetted only this week.

THE Public Works Chittagong Hill Tracts Division ceases to exist from the 11th July next.

UNDER the Indian Steam-vessels Act, Monghyr and Bhagulpore have been declared to be places for the survey of inland steam-vessels, the Superintendent of the Tirhoot State Railway being the Surveyor. In Monghyr, the Magistrate of the District, and in Bhagulpore, the Senior Subordinate Magistrate at head-quarters, i.e., the Joint-Magistrate, or in his absence the Senior Deputy Magistrate will receive Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—It is impossible entirely to prevent the noxious vapours which are given off in mines and tunnels, and those who, like miners and railway operatives, have to work day after day in such vitiated atmospheres, suffer in health and strength in consequence. The chest and liver often become clogged with the products of coal combustion, necessitating great attention to the health. No remedy is more valuable for miners and the like than Holloway's Pills, as they carry off all effete matter from the blood, and healthily stimulate the liver. They are also invaluable for costive bowels and for all bilious disorders. The Ointment is a priceless remedy for piles, sprains, ulcers and all manner of sores.

declarations of the surveyor, deliver certificates of survey, give notice to owners or masters of steam-vessels when certificates are ready for delivery, and receive expired, cancelled or suspended survey certificates. Offences against the Act will be tried in those two places.

SUBADAR Shaik Imdad Ali, Bahadur, Governor-General's Body Guard, has been taken in as an Aide-de-Camp and Risaldar-Major Nawab Muhammad Afzal Khan, C.S.I., Khan Bahadur, 11th Bengal Lancers, as an Honorary Aid-de-Camp of the Viceroy's personal staff.

THE Cantonment of Cachar will henceforth be known as the Silchar cantonment.

It is reported that "for the protection and liberty accorded to Catholics in Persia," the Pope has presented the Shah Nasr-ud-Deen with the Order of Pius IX., forwarding the insignia with an autograph letter.

INFLUENZA has had its run among our Simian brethren of Kichkinda. It is reported from Kurnul, Southern India, that

"The animals were quite conspicuous one day by their absence, so that everything, left out to dry on terraces, was undisturbed,—quite an unusual experience. Next morning they were seen in groups here and there, some coughing terribly, others reeling like drunken men, and then, later on, the unpleasant stillness, that reigned under the trees, which afforded them shelter, was often disturbed by the crash of a heavy monkey, coming precipitately down to the ground to die."

IN Russia, they have adopted stringent measures against adulterated food. A person convicted of adulteration or sale of injurious substances as food is liable to a fine of 300 roubles (£48), or three months' imprisonment. A repetition of the offence doubles the penalty, while the third conviction deprives him of all civil and political rights.

A RUSSIAN globe-trotter from Archangel returning home with some samples of tea grown in Ceylon, distributed them among his friends. There is now a demand at Archangel for the Ceylon tea.

It is a hundred years since the dome of St. Peter's at Rome cracked and was put to rights by a strong metallic band. Fissures are again now reported.

To render help to Transatlantic liners in distress, an ocean patrol is being talked of in America. The suggestion is to divide the steamer routes into eight squares, each with a patrolling vessel ready always to render aid. Old war-ships are proposed to be utilised for the purpose, England and the United States each contributing two vessels, and Italy, France, Germany and Sweden making up the remainder. The Congress will be applied to for an International Conference for the details.

THE latest news regarding Sir Frederick Roberts is that he does not succeed Lord Wolseley as Adjutant-General of her Majesty's forces, but remains in India and continues to be the Commander-in-Chief for an extended term of two years.

SIRDAR Charat Singh, Sub-Judge of Montgomery—son of John Lawrence's friend Nehal Singh, Chhuchhi, K.C.S.I., who assisted him during the Mutinies—accused of bribery and corruption, has been acquitted of the charges, and transferred at his own request to Hissar.

HERE is progress in agriculture:—

"An exhibit at the last Royal Society's meeting by Mr. D. Morris, of the Royal Gardens, Kew, was of great practical interest; this was a sugar-cane seed and seedlings. As the result of some experiments with self-sown seedlings, it is anticipated that, by cross fertilisation and a careful selection of seedlings, it will now be possible to raise new and improved varieties of sugar cane, and renew the constitutional vigour of plants that have become deteriorated through continuous cultivation by cuttings or slips. Great importance is attached to the subject in sugar-producing countries, as it opens up an entirely new field of investigation in regard to sugar-cane cultivation."

We hope our local Agri-Horticultural Society and planters and practical men will attend to the suggestion.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

ANOTHER plot to murder the Czar! On the night of the 16th, it was discovered that various parts of the Gatschina palace had been undermined.

THE difference in the Ministry has been patched up, it seems. Mr. Smith has been humoured and allowed his own way. He has accordingly been drawn out of his sulks. He has proved the talk horse. Mr. Balfour is a brilliant man and is bound to rise to the highest parliamentary position, but that is not yet—even near. Just now, though he is one of the leading props of the ministry, his influence is not equal to Mr. Smith's. The latter is very far from a fool, but his party value is out of all proportion to his talents. Hence, we suspect, the Irish Secretary has been prevailed upon to give in to him. Possibly, Mr. Smith's great experience has suggested some wise reason for postponing Mr. Balfour's pet measure. Mr. Smith has notified to the Lower House that he would move for a standing order enabling Government to carry over Bills to next session, including the Land Purchase Bill, the Government proceeding with the Licensing, Tithes, Police and Indian Councils Bills. This has elicited a counter notice from Mr. Gladstone that the previous opinion of the Select Committee was a preliminary requisite to the Government proposal.

THE American Senate voted the Silver Bill by forty two against twenty five votes, rejecting all the amendments of the Finance Committee with the exception of the one for removing the bullion redemption clause, which was adopted by a large majority. The Bill so amended by the Senate was presented to the House of Representatives on Wednesday, the 18th. The House was then sitting in Committee, and a motion by Mr. Bland that the Committee should rise to enable the House to discuss the Bill was rejected by a majority of eleven votes. The Senate has made the dollar unit of value at 412½ grains of standard silver of twenty-five cents of gold, and retained free coinage under certain conditions.

THE most important telegraphic news of the week is the conclusion of the convention between England and Germany regarding East and Central Africa. By the stipulation of July 2, 1887, the German sphere of influence was reserved south of the Victoria, England confining herself to the regions north of that line. Mr. Stanley thus describes the German sphere:—

"Its eastern coast is about 450 miles long, it extends from east to west about 950, its western line is the length of the Tanganyika Lake, 303 miles, north and south its central line is over 700 miles long, and the whole embraces approximately 600,000 square miles. On the north it has a lake shore line of 350 miles, to the west it has the Tanganyika, 303 miles, on Nyassa Lake to the south it has a shore line of about 180 miles. By these three spacious lakes she commands the Victoria Lake coast line of 1,300 miles, the Tanganyika coast line of 950 miles, the Nyassa coast line, 950 miles—total, 3,200 miles of lacustrine coast inhabited by tribes accustomed to trade. It is the finest region of Africa; it grows wheat and rice and coffee equally well. Its inhabitants are born traders, and take kindly to labour of any kind. They are industrious, keen at barter, frugal, and, if they are considerably treated, will make the best of subjects. They have been accustomed to commerce for the last sixty years; they are acquainted with white men since 1857, when Burton and Speke discovered the Tanganyika. Though English explorers have made the country known, and eight English mission stations have been planted there since 1876, the British Government meekly surrendered the whole to Germany as her sphere of influence, on the understanding that north of the southern shore of the Nyanza should be reserved for Great Britain."

The previous concessions were Kilima-Njaro, discovered by a missionary in British pay, a tract of the Masailand 20,000 square miles in extent, first explored by a British traveller, and a coast line 200 miles long along the shores of the Victoria Nyanza, also explored by a traveller in British employ.

The terms of the present convention, as telegraphed by the Central News Agency, are:—

"England is to hold Wituland, Stephenson Road, and Uganda; Germany extending her Congo frontier from Tanganyika to the first degree of South Latitude, but reserving to England the right of free transit northward.

Zanzibar cedes the rights of sovereignty to England and Germany conjointly. With the assent of Germany, England assumes exclusive protection of Zanzibar; in return for which concession, England cedes Heligoland to Germany. The islanders living there now are to be exempted from compulsory Naval and Military service at present. The prevailing customs tariffs are not to be interfered with for a period of twenty years."

Here is a description of the ceded island:—The North Sea, captured "Heligoland (Holy Land), a small island in 36, and about 25 miles from Denmark in 1807, situate opposite Lleser, and the J. and, in 7° 51' the mouths of the Elbe, the Eider, the W. andy Island it is about two and E. long. and 54° 11' N. lat. Including 5 and has an area of about three-fourths of a square mile, with a pure and unrivalled sea-bathing, it is much sequence of its salubrious climate by German and other visitors, sometimes resorted to as a bathing-place the season. It is a coast-guard and rocket to the number of 15,000 tons, who live by fishing and letting lodgings, station. The inhabitant language of their own, which linguists say is undoubtedly Anglo-Saxon. Lobsters to the number of nearly 30,000 are gathered annually in boxes for local use, or are sent to the continent, they are the average price per lb. varies from 7¹/₂d. to 1s. 6d. The where the annual yield of the fisheries is about £7,000; there is also a average in the skins of wild birds shot around the island. The vital statistics of Heligoland are marvellous, the average life of the inhabitants is stated to be over 63 years. Revenue in 1886, £11,715; Expenditure in 1886, 11,786."

Mr. Stanley, who had been denouncing any concession to Germany, is reported to have highly eulogised the new Anglo-German Convention, which adds a hundred thousand square miles to the British Empire. The Radicals are furious at the cession of Heligoland. The press notices it favourably. Mr. Smith, replying to a question in the Lower House, said that if Parliament rejects the cession of the island, the whole convention collapses.

- THE solar eclipse of Thursday was obscured by clouds in Calcutta. The weather was fine and sky clear at Simla. At Bhagulpore the phenomenon was clearly visible, except in the last or the fourth stage. Father Peneranda had been to Bhagulpore to observe the annular eclipse. At Commillah it was probably seen to better advantage than anywhere in Bengal. At 5 P. M. the cry of ooloo, which does duty in that part for the blowing of shells and striking of gongs in these districts, was heard in the air—the signal that the attack on the sun had commenced. The encroachment proceeded, till at 5:57 P. M. the dark orb of the moon had got its share of the great luminary, as to leave a luminous rim. This was a most interesting sight which continued for about 3 minutes.

THE Governor-General in Council has "declared every railway administration to be liable from and after the 1st May 1890 to pay every tax which it was lawfully required by or on behalf of any local authority to pay in aid of the funds of such authority during the year ended on the 30th April 1890."

What is this enigma and what the occasion?

IN the case of a railway administered by the Government, the Director-General of Railways has been permitted to be the officer who is to make general rules under sec. 47 of the Indian Railways Act, 1890. The Governor-General in Council also delegates to Local Governments the following powers exercisable by himself:—

"(1) Sections 7, 9 and 11.—All the powers and functions of the Governor-General in Council, subject to the proviso that the exercise and discharge of such powers and functions will not entail any expenditure in excess of the general powers of sanction of the Local Government concerned.

(2) Section 48.—All the powers and functions of the Governor-General in Council, only in cases where the railways concerned are under the control of one and the same Local Government.

(3) Section 51.—All the powers and functions of the Governor-General in Council.

(4) Section 5; section 51, clauses (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e); and section 55.—All the powers and functions of the Governor-General in Council.

(5) Section 63.—The power of determining the vernacular languages in which the maximum number of passengers to be carried in each compartment shall be exhibited.

(6) Section 83.—The power of notifying the Magistrates and Police-officers to whom notices of railway accidents are to be given."

It is not an unconditional delegation, though. The powers and functions may be revoked or varied, and the exercise and discharge thereof controlled, as may from time to time be thought fit. Was this special reservation absolutely necessary? We believe, the Viceroy is always competent, with or without any express authority, to supervise every department or to control any action of any local Governor. It is certainly too much to expect the Governor-General in Council to do the minute functions of the sections of the Railway Act quoted above.

But that is the evil of modern legislation in India. The law is made general, all control is vested in one authority, enabling that authority to delegate its powers or sanction byelaws for effectual carrying out of any particular measure. Thus you take power only to delegate or to make subsidiary laws. That only bespeaks lax legislation and tends to careless administration.

THE Nizam's High Court shirks responsibility for trial of European British subject. It has come to the conclusion that it has no jurisdiction over British-born offenders of law. The young English lady who assaulted a native will, therefore, be tried by General Campbell, the English Judge in the Nizam's service, and a Justice of the Peace under the Foreign Jurisdiction Act. Which law will be applied in the case—the English, Indian or Hyderabad?

THE clever writer who furnishes the Moffusil Notes in the Indian Planter's Gazette reports a hunting accident followed by a remarkable rescue from an unexpected quarter. He says:—

"Behar is not likely ever to forget the heroic defence by Mrs. Fred. Needham of her husband after he had been bowled insensible off his pony by a gang of lathi-armed cowards, nor will Cooch Behar ever cease to boast of Mrs. Evans Gordon's plucky encounter with a tiger. But we have now to chronicle a further act of cool bravery on the part of a Lower Bengal lady which is certainly worthy of being handed down to posterity. Almost all residents in Behar and Bengal are well acquainted with that excellent old sportsman and planter, Mr. Morey. About three weeks ago he was out pigsticking accompanied by his daughter, when a pig suddenly sprang from the jungle, and charging Mr. Morey sent horse and man a terrible crumpler, the brute proceeding to make havoc of his fallen foes. But scarcely was Mr. Morey down ere his brave girl was on terra-firma too, and unhesitatingly rushed to place herself between the boar and her insensible father. Unarmed as she was, it is horrible to think what the result might have been, but fortunately she had with her a large greyhound who went straight for the boar, drew his attention away and finally drove him off. Miss Morey then running to the nearest pool and filling her topce with water managed to bring her father round. The natives instead of assisting came up only when all danger was over. Hats off boys to Miss Morey!"

And may God bless her! we say with all our heart. Miss Morey is a heroine beyond question, but, above all, she has proved herself a true daughter—a treasure worth half a dozen indifferent or insouciant sons. We hope Mr. Morey adequately appreciates his possession. Whatever may be urged in favour of the Salic law in royal houses, how hideous appears the law and custom of primogeniture, in the face of such deeds of high enterprise by tender woman! It would be a fitting response worthy of the parent of the heroine, if Mr. Morey bequeathed the bulk of his property to her. The honour of the incident would then be complete.

ON the last Eed there was a large gathering of all the Mussulmans in England at the only mosque in Great Britain, and probably in all Western Europe, namely, that erected with Indian subscriptions at Woking. We read:—

"A considerable number of Mahomedan gentlemen went from London, Cambridge, and other places to the Oriental Institute at Woking, on the 21st ultimo, in order to celebrate the Eed festival at the mosque, which is in connection with the institute. After the conclusion of the religious ceremonies, which were conducted by some of the Mahomedan residents at the institute, the members of that creed present on the occasion whether belonging to the Sunni, Shiah, or other Mahomedan persuasion, embraced one another fraternally and adjourned to the meal that marks the conclusion of the month of Ramzan, during which 'the faithful' are obliged to fast."

That was indeed a most interesting ceremony, showing the advance of toleration. Fifty years ago, the mob with the cry of No Turk would have razed the mosque to the ground. Are these all Oriental Mussalmans or are some of them native converts—men like the Whites and Greens of Madras who have exchanged Christianity for Islam?

It would be interesting to have a list of these gentlemen, giving the names, addresses, nationality, persuasion, position, of each. Such a list would be a good indication of the progress in secular education and Western enterprise made severally by the Eastern nations and communities whose representatives were thus assembled at Dr. Leitner's mosque.

The incident is not without political value. England is thus annexed by Islam—theologically, a fact which constitutes a religious claim on the loyalty of Mussulman residents.

POOR Time is in a fix—on all sides. Steam first, and Electricity afterwards, annihilated him, in the phrase of the day. If the former reduced the old Conqueror to an Elba Napoleon, the latter shut him up in the distant island-prison of St. Helena as it were. But a worse fate remained, and now poor Chronos is little better than a crone. The men of science in especial are his worst enemy. They are continually pushing him into a corner. And now the very traders snap their fingers at him, defying him to do his worst. Articles on which Time has exercised his characteristic debasing and deforming powers are now-a-days easily touched up and habitually passed for brand-new. His influence came thus to be confined to the one trade in which he was a real benefactor—the wine trade. But alas! he has been dislodged from his last stronghold—deprived of his remaining protégés. The wine-merchants are now prepared to do without him. The silent action of years which so improves the quality of their goods, they will obtain in a trice, and they no longer mean to wait upon the pleasure or convenience of the old warrior armed with the scythe and holding an hour glass.

LIGHT has been found to age new wines. The method is to expose layers of young wine, in vessels covered with colored glass, to the direct action of the sun, which considerably improves both the flavour and the quality.

Apropos of our remark of last week on head-dresses, we pick up the following:—

"A member of the Allahabad Rifle Volunteers, on taking down his helmet a few days ago, found that a pair of sparrows had built a very comfortable nest therein, and had raised a brood of young ones!"

So all nature is in a conspiracy of derision against the ugly topce! The wily sparrows! what practical jokers are they!

IN connection with the New World Exhibition of 1892, Mr. Barnum has started an exhibition idea of his own, calculating the income at a million of money. He advises the Fair Committee to obtain of the Egyptian Government, the loan of, and exhibit, the mummified corpse of Rameses II., the Pharaoh of the Exodus, with that of his daughter, the saviour of Moses, and other less distinguished members of the royal Egyptian family of that era. He thus speaks of his idea:—

"Think of the stupendousness of the incongruity, to exhibit to the people of the nineteenth century, in a country not discovered until 2,000 or 3,000 years after his death the corpse of the king of whom we have the earliest record! Consider, too, that that corpse is so perfectly preserved after thousands of years in the tomb that its features are almost perfect; so perfect that every man, woman and child who looks upon the mummy may know the countenance of the despot who exerted so great an influence upon the history of the world."

We confess it is a capital idea. It is easy to deride, but Mr. Phineas Barnum is indeed a man of genius who would have distinguished himself in almost any sphere of action to which he had chosen to devote himself.

WE copy the following from the Indian Planters' Gazette:—

"We hear that 'strong efforts are being made in New Zealand by a confederacy of capitalists to push the trade of horses, frozen meat and preserved fruits in India, and that an experienced man in the matter will shortly visit the Madras and Bengal Presidencies to see what chance there is of opening up a market for New Zealand and Australian produce generally."

Horses, frozen meat and preserved fruits may be a delectable olla podrida in Southern Pacific, in the neighbourhood of the Fiji Islands, and possibly welcome to some heroic stomachs nearer home. But, as a rule, we fear it is not the thing for palates used to delicacies like rice and curry and cutlets. As regards carnivorous Young India, he will have none of it. And for India in general, neither Hindus nor Mussulmans are hippophagi.

BUT what are the hippophagi of New Zealand before the anthropophagi of New England! Go-ahead America has developed a new industry. It is said—

"Ear-makers in New York confine themselves to their own speciality. Ears are frequently lost in America in personal fisticuffs, for there is nothing your American enjoys more than a good chew at the ear of an antagonist, not to speak of the chance to slash it off with a bowie knife or a razor. Ears are also frequently lost through frost-bite. The restorer models them cleverly out of plaster of Paris, taking the remaining ear as a copy, then makes them from a composition of wax, India-rubber, and a peculiar sort of gum, and affixes them by rubber suction to the side of the head."

What! the American enjoys nothing so much as a good chew at the ear of a man! We hope the Americans who come to this country leave their peculiar taste in the West Indies or in Japan, just as Europeans used, as was said, to leave their conscience at the Cape.

As for the ear-makers, they are an ingenious set. How wondrously they make their bogus organs of wax, India rubber and gum! Only we are afraid these are rather too melting ears which would dissolve even before a tale of pity was recited. And, above all, how they affix them! But the question is, can you pull them—the ears, that is, not the makers?

THE banished Yaksha in Kalidasa's beautiful poem beseeches a passing cloud to convey a verbal message of love and fidelity for him to his lonely wife at home far off. Modern lovers have the benefit of the handy medium of writing through the post. Now they have to hand a mode of exchanging their thoughts even more to the purpose, because more direct—in Mr. Edison's great discovery. Besides, valuable as writing is, toward this and other ends, it is after all an art confined, even in these days of enlightenment, to a minority. Accordingly, correspondence through the Post Office is a luxury from which the many are debarred. Not so the phonograph. It is the sovereign resource for the masses—a truly universal boon.

Heaven first taught letters for some wretch's aid,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid;
They live, they speak, they breathe what love inspires,
Warm from the soul, and faithful to its fires,
The virgin's wish without her fears impart,
Excuse the blush, and pour out all the heart,
Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And waft a sigh from Indus to the pole.

Great as is the invention of letters, all that is the language of exaggeration in respect of it as a channel of inter-communication between soul and soul. What is predicated of it, however, is strictly true of the new American instrument. We are glad to find that not only individuals but nations have already begun to make the most of it in this behalf.

The Mexican Post office is utilising the phonograph to the rescue and relief of the illiterate:—

"The Mexican Post Office authorities have taken up the phonograph and placed it at the disposal of the public at a charge of six to twelve centimes the 1,000 words. The intending user, having paid the fee, speaks into the machine, after which the cylinder is packed in a case and forwarded to the persons addressed, who receives, besides, from the Post Office, a phonograph which repeats the message, and is then returned to the office. As a large proportion of Mexicans have not yet solved the mystery of reading and writing, this method of corresponding is found very serviceable."

That ought to shame the United States, to say nothing of Western Europe.

WE rejoice to hear the best reports of the Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad's health. He has been steadily, if slowly, improving, until he is now in a condition to dictate and sign simple letters. Last week, such a letter was received in Calcutta.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 21, 1890.

THE EXTENSION OF HONORARY ADMINISTRATION IN BENGAL.

SIR Steuart Bayley's scheme of enlarging the powers of Honorary Magisterial Benches is receiving practical application. Independent Benches are being constituted to supersede the Benches where the Honorary Magistrates sit with a stipendiary Magistrate. The idea is an excellent one which will afford some relief to the overworked official staff, while it will tend to train up a body of non-official auxiliaries in the Administration who might be left to deal with the less onerous portion of magisterial duty. The Government are wisely cautious in not vesting all present Honorary Magistrates with higher powers. We fully approve of this as the best guarantee against future failure. We even go farther, and think the present departure a good occasion for a careful revision of the lists of Honoraries. Among them there are not a few who should never have been appointed as not fulfilling the requisite intellectual standard. There are others who have no time or take no interest, and yet do not resign, nor have been compelled to resign. With an initial overhauling of the existing Honorary staff, the experiment of Sir Steuart Bayley would have a better chance of success. As it is, we would not be surprised if there occurred failures here and there.

The course followed in the constitution of the Independent Benches in the metropolitan district of the 24-Pergunnahs, deserves wider application. It makes a discreet advance upon the present system, with sufficient safeguards against miscarriage. If only care is taken in fixing the rotation of the Honorary Magistrates with due regard to their qualifications, and none but simple cases are made over to them, at any rate in the beginning, the new experiment is very likely to be a success. These precautions will be imperative at the outset, and the working of these Independent Benches will require close watching by, and sympathetic attention from, the district officers.

Under orders of the Government of Bengal dated the 22nd April last, and at the recommendation of the Presidency Commissioner, the Regular Benches of Alipur, Sealdah, Barranagar, Dum-Dum, Bussirhat, Baraset, Barrackpore, Diamond Harbour and Naihati have been converted into Independent Benches with the powers of a Magistrate of the 2nd class as well as with power to try summarily the offences mentioned in Section 261 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Any two of the Honorary Magistrates attached to these Benches may in future form an Independent Bench, and exercise 2nd class powers, although personally they may be vested with only 3rd class powers. In this arrangement we find exemplified the wise caution with which the Government, as we have already observed above, are giving effect to the measure. It is necessary that the present Honorary Magistrates should go through a period of training before they are vested with 2nd class powers personally. Of course in saying this, we make an exception in favor of those, if any, who by their legal knowledge and past career, may have now sufficient confidence with the authorities to be vested with the higher powers. As a rule, however, the Honorary Magistrates in the interior of the country have yet to prove their desert. We know of some who cannot but prove failures, unless they have the advantage of sitting with better qualified colleagues. In any case, it is discreet that at the beginning of the experiment, in the generality of cases, the Benches rather than the officers individually should be vested with the increased powers.

These Benches will try only such cases as may be made over to them by the Magistrate who will receive the complaints, and fix the rotation of the Honorary Magistrates. Cases likely to be of a protracted character will not ordinarily be made over to these Benches by the Magistrate. Their work will thus be light and simple, and it is hoped they may do credit to themselves and to the authorities appointing them.

THE INDIAN POLICE ADMINISTRATION.

THE earnest attention of the Government has at last been directed to the subject of police administration. This is in fulfilment of the promise made by Lord Dufferin on the eve of his departure. There are grave defects in that administration, and they are admitted by all the Local Governments. The only differences that exist are naturally about the remedies. We are not at all sorry that the recommendation of our Local Government for the appointment of a Commission of Enquiry has not found favour with the Government of India. The faults in the police system are sufficiently known to require an elaborate investigation. The Public Service Commission in its enquiries into this special department has moreover left on record its views as to the lines on which the police service should be reformed. The Government of India have sufficient information on the subject. The necessity for early reform is also recognised. The question, however, has to be viewed with reference to financial considerations, and it is here that the practical solution of the question presents the least hopeful aspect.

Apart, however, from the financial issues involved in the subject, the administration of the police is susceptible of improvement in other ways. Although we believe there will be no satisfactory settlement of the question unless the Government were prepared to provide a far more liberal scale of expenditure for the police service, nevertheless the police is but a limb of the magistracy, and the action of the magistrates must have its effects upon the working of the police. The broad question as viewed by the Government is, How efficiently to control crime? Towards this, the agency of a capable and trustworthy police is of course of the last importance. But the administration of the criminal law by the magistracy and the judiciary must also be an important factor in the problem. In the Government despatches lately published on the subject, all the various causes leading to the present unsatisfactory state of things in regard to the control of crime are referred to, or discussed more or less fully, and the Local Governments are invited to cooperate with the Government of India towards more effectually dealing with crime and criminals.

Of the causes other than the incapacity and untrustworthiness of the police accounting for the present lax control of crime, the following are assigned by the local Governments:—

1. The jury system is unsuitable.
2. The native magistracy is weak, and the Subordinate Executive Service has very few Europeans in it.
3. The drafts made from the Civil Service for Burmah, Assam, &c., have seriously crippled the administration.
4. The delay in disposing of criminal cases is inordinate.
5. The district magistrates exercise imperfect supervision over the subordinate magistrates.

These statements are generally accepted by the Government of India, with more or less reservations. The information before them as to the working of the jury system justifies, it is said, a more detailed enquiry into the manner in which it has operated, or at all events as to the extent to which it has been applied. As to the question of the adequacy of the judicial staff, the Governor-General in Council refers to a statement given in the Secretary of State's despatch on the proposal of the Public Service Commission which gives the number of cadre posts which are considered to be necessary for the administration. It is further stated to be unlikely that there will in future be any such disturbing influence as the annexation of Burmah to lead to the drain of civil officers from Bengal to other parts of India. The remarks of the Government of India on the shortcomings of the Subordinate Executive Service are of great importance. It is said :—"The Governor-General in Council does not doubt that the absence of Europeans in the Subordinate Executive Service has not been without effect on the criminal administration, and he hopes that the present defects in the service may be to some extent remedied by the action to be taken on paragraph 15 of Home Department letter No. 302 dated 14th February 1890. While, however, the Government of India hope that these orders will not be without effect, the fact must be recognised that the Provincial Service will always be mainly composed of natives of India, and that the proper remedy for the defects in the procedure of subordinate magistrates is to secure that their work shall be regularly supervised by the Magistrate of the District and experienced Sub-divisional Magistrates." The tendency to delay and adjournments, favoring the escape of criminals, as well as the further tendency to impose inadequate punishments should also be checked. The Government of India also refer to the necessity of making better provision for the punishment of habitual offenders and for the improvement of the agency engaged in prosecuting cases in Magisterial Courts.

We cannot dismiss the subject without saying that the Government of India betray an evident natural bias, imbibed from too implicit a reliance on the reports of their European subordinates, against the native personnel of local and subdivisional administration. Whatever the amount of that bias, it has been expressed with a temper worthy of the Supreme Government. Still any prejudice in such a quarter on such a subject is a serious thing, detrimental not only to individual servants of the state but to the efficiency of administration. There is certainly another view of the matter, and the class of public servants affected ought not to be remiss in bringing it forward. We hope on another occasion to lay our view before the public.

REGISTRATION OF MAHOMEDAN MARRIAGE.

NAWAB Abdool Luteef Bahadoor, although he has not interest enough with Government, Local and Imperial, to be appointed to the Viceroy's Council for making Laws and Regulations, is unquestionably the most distinguished public man among the Mahomedans in Bengal, and the leading representative of that community. His services to that community during a protracted career have been repeatedly acknowledged by Government. And, although he has now some years retired from his professional work on pension, he is still at his public labours of love, and unremitting in his exertions for the benefit of his fellow Mahomedans. Not the least of his cares in that behalf has been devoted to the question of marriage, that important bond of society and factor in domestic peace and happiness. For thirty years, the Nawab has laboured on this field, with varying degrees of success, but with unvarying tenacity of purpose which was bound to be successful in the end. His first effort in this connection was in endeavouring to retain the old Kazis for the registration of marriages at the time that the abolition of that office was under consideration of Government. Although the Nawab induced the Lieutenant-Governor for the time being, Sir John Peter Grant, to accept the suggestion and urge it upon the consideration of the Supreme Government, he failed then in his endeavours and Act XI of 1864 was passed abolishing Kazis root and branch. The apprehended results followed. The number of offences against marriage began to increase, especially in the Eastern and Mahomedan Districts of Bengal, to such an extent and the number of convictions for the same began to be proportionately so small, that the attention of Government was arrested and enquiries instituted which shewed that the absence of any authorised system of registration for Mahomedan marriages and divorces was at the bottom of the mischief. The first attempt to tackle with the difficulty was that of Syud Azimuddin Hussein Khan, who obtained the permission of Sir Cecil Beadon to introduce into the Bengal Council a Bill for the appointment of registrars for Mahomedan marriages. The Syud, however, committed the mistake of making the registration compulsory, which raised such a howl from different quarters that the measure had to be abandoned. In 1869, the grievances of the Mahomedan community, due to the want of facilities for keeping proper record of marriages and divorces, were brought prominently to public notice by the Nawab during the discussion of his paper on the Mahomedan Law of Marriage and Dower before the Bengal Social Science Association. Continued hammering at last attracted the attention of Sir George Campbell, who ordered the preparation of a voluntary Registration Bill, that being the cardinal point of difference between the proposals of the Nawab and those of Syud Azimuddin and the party identified with him. The Bill was brought in by Mr. Dampier in November 1873, and it progressed well through the usual stages, the Nawab (then a member of the Council) taking, as might be expected, a prominent part therein, and the Bill was ripe for final passing when the Nawab vacated his seat in the Council by efflux of time. By a strange coincidence, attempts were immediately made, and a great deal of wire-pulling resorted to in order to prevent the passing of the Bill on the ground that it would interfere with the Mahomedan religion. It does not speak much for the political honesty of the instigators of this agitation, when we recollect that they were the very men identified with the previous abortive compulsory Bill. Government had no difficulty in seeing through the real character of the agitation, and the Bill was finally passed in November 1875, and it became law as Act No. I. of 1876.

Since its passing, the measure has had to struggle against various adverse influences. The party who pose as the party of reform amongst the Mahomedans have been always incessantly endeavouring to introduce a compulsory system running after a false imitation of the Frankish system. The Registration Department, which stands in a step-fatherly position to the Mahomedan Registration, would only be too glad for such a huge addition of grist to the mill. The Mahomedan registrars themselves would be only too delighted to make such a prodigious addition to their work and their income. Accordingly, from time to time, serious assaults have been delivered against the present voluntary system, and it has taxed all the courage and skill of the Nawab to defend the same. Not unoften he has carried the assault into the enemy's camp and bettered his position thereby. The representative Committee appointed by the Bengal Government to consider the Mahomedan Registration question, reporting in 1881, unanimously condemned in indignant terms any form of compulsory registration. The "reform party" who would be only too glad to prove the Nawab wrong in anything, returned to the charge, alleging the voluntary system to have failed and suggesting a compulsory system of registration of Mahomedan marriages and divorces, subject to a pecuniary penalty for non-registration as in the case of births and deaths. In a well-reasoned Minute dated the 21st October last, supported by merciless logic and convincing facts and figures, the Nawab has combated the assertions of his opponents, given the true history of the measure from its inception, upheld the necessity of the voluntary as against the compulsory system, demonstrated that the present Act is in no sense a failure, but pregnant with the best hopes for progress, and suggested certain measures for the better working of the Act. The Minute has been printed for private circulation, and it would do the rising generation of Mahomedans good to study the same as forming an important chapter of their social history and as a model of public controversy. We are glad to find that the Nawab has again vindicated the usefulness and inviolability of the voluntary Registration Act, as appears from the following communication :—

"From Sir John Edgar, K. C. I. E., C. S. I., Chief Secretary to the Government of Bengal,
To Nawab Abdool Lutef Bahadur, C. I. E.,

Dated Ranchi, the 20th March, 1890.
With reference to your letter dated the 21st October 1889, I am directed to convey the thanks of the Lieutenant-Governor for your interesting and valuable Memorandum therewith forwarded, regarding the working of the Mahomedan Marriage Registration Act I. (B.C.) of 1876.

2. I am at the same time to inform you that the Lieutenant-Governor has decided not to consider any proposal for compulsion in the matter of registration of Mahomedan Marriages and Divorces whether such compulsion be direct or indirect, unless he is satisfied that the measure would be favorably received by all classes of Mahomedans. On the other hand the suggestions made in the Memorandum, especially those contained in paras : 31, 34, 37, 38, 39, and 42 will receive careful attention."

In resisting the proposals for compulsory registration, the Nawab is fighting the battle of all Indian communities. In these impecunious days, from a compulsory marriage registration Act to a marriage tax is but a step, and would be the signal for the so-called reformers to agitate for the prevention of registration for early marriages, plural marriages and so forth. The country in such a case would be disturbed from one end to the other, and serious administrative difficulties created.

MOURNING IN A TEMPLE OF PLEASURE.

They fall or are plucked and then they are trodden under unheeding foot or they lie and wither and are buried in the dust whereto they are kin—who knows, who marks, who cares? Who cares for the Fallen Leaves of society—even though some of them are more useful and beautiful than many on the tree? Least of all is the concern for the emphatically fallen—the fallen leaves of fallen plants—the dropped leaves or even flowers of dropped-down creepers. Who will mourn for our sister of the Temple of Pleasure who is gone—

Fallen, fallen, fallen, fallen?

A Temple indeed! A heathen pagoda, to be sure! a sanctuary of Satan! As for the pleasure, it must be an unhallowed enjoyment—an improper pleasure. And, after delivering this appropriate sentiment, Mrs. Grundy settles herself in her easy chair, draws close around her her cloak of virtue, and vigorously fans her face livid with the strain of assuming her easy look of piety and propriety.

Well done, Mrs. Grundy! your sentiments are excellently good. But perhaps such a capital speech is too much for your poor nerves. Perhaps you require some repose after that, and, perhaps, some sort of pick-me-up too. No! that word is too profane for ladies' ears, we beg your pardon. We understand you. Here you are—the smelling salts. You forget, Mrs. Grundy, the punkab is overhead and in full swing, don't tire your delicate hand with fanning.

Do you require the thermantidote? Bearab!—No? Don't care for it? All right. No 'thanks,' please, only try to snatch a bit of a nap while we record a bit of a social event which you, Mrs. Grundy, need not trouble yourself to know about.

Death has plucked away another "star" from the native stage. The heroine of the "Star" boards—Srimati Kiran Kumari—is dead, having fallen a victim to the fell epidemic of smallpox of late raging in the city. The dead actress was a rare flower of her profession—another young genius who promised to burst before long into full bloom and splendour. In so young an age, she betrayed extraordinary talents. To natural versatility and a clear fancy, she joined a good fund of vivacity and a nervous pluck that removed every obstacle before her. On the retirement of the former heroine from the stage—an actress of unrivalled ability, she was chosen out, while yet very young and in the initial stage of her apprenticeship, to fill the vacancy, to the mortification of the veteran lady artistes who had all hoped for the prize promotion. It was a nervous step in all conscience for both the veteran manager and the young novice. But the trepidation was all over with the first night of the experiment. The sudden and irrevocable resignation of the lady "Star" had plunged the manager into a sea of despair, and the wreck of his bark on the rocks ahead of incompetency seemed imminent. Indeed, the success of the rather bold experiment averted what may be called a financial disaster. The young novice proved to be the real pole-star of the manager's hope to save his theatre from the impending peril. That very night she re-assured all hopes and belied all fears. The test she was put to was trying for the nerves of any actor or actress in the world. She had to interpret Chaitanya, perhaps the most difficult of Bengalee dramatic characters, and in her delineation of it she proved herself thoroughly deserving of the exalted lift, if not equal to her glorious predecessor. Ever since she was fixed to fill all the title rôles and she filled them with equal credit. Her great drawback in the acting of these old parts was the brilliant triumphs of her predecessor, the glowing tints of which could never vanish or fade from the memories of her audiences. She knew this and wisely contented herself by imitating the great actress even at the risk of being considered affected and artificial—the inevitable result of all imitations. But soon the day of her true appreciation came. The new drama of the realistic school was placed upon the boards, the title rôle being allotted to her. As Sarala she might be said to have made her real débüt, and as Sarala, it is enough to say, she can never be forgotten, for, even now, at the mention of the picture, many a playgoers' eyes must glisten with a tear. In short, if her imitations were wonderful, her own work was simply marvellous, and Sarala proved the greatest of financial successes to her employers. The Star Theatre has sustained in her death, occurring so soon after that of the inimitable "Bel Baboo," a loss which is beyond repair, unless indeed the old heroine reappears on its boards, while the lovers of the Native drama have lost one who, perhaps born to be society's curse, wonderfully converted herself into a boon which afforded them very high and healthy intellectual treats.

KILLING IN PLAY.

Narail, June 17, 1890.

At present the townlet of Narail is in great excitement. It has been of late the scene of a tragic occurrence. It came to pass in the following way. On last Friday morning, some of our boys, confined within doors on a rainy day, betook themselves to card-playing, as a means of whiling away their time. There was, as usual, a lot of idle spectators around. One Shuklal Ghosh, a boy of 18 or 20, son of the late Baboo Wooma Charan Ghosh, was among the number. This jolly blade of a young Bengali was cutting jokes and mischievously telling each other's "hands." This annoyed all, but particularly roused the anger of one of his opposing set in the game. This was Ramlal Rakhit, who, now and then, threatened Shuklal with his displeasure. The boy was not to be stopped, however; he went on as before with fatal pertinacity. Ramlal grew furious. He forbade the imp of mischief again and again, but it was "crying only in the woods." At last, losing all patience, Ramlal suddenly got up, darted to the next room and produced a goodly stick capped with a steel ball. Gentle reader, it is needless to say what followed next—the stick fell and knocked the poor boy on the head. It was a thoughtless blow resulting in fracture. The boy died the next day at 3 A.M., for sheer want of proper treatment. Serious as was the case, had proper care been taken, he might have survived this accident.

Now, while all were engaged with the boy, our hero Ramlal took to his heels, and no one knows, as yet, his whereabouts. Wherever he may be, whether in British dominion or in alien lands, he will be brought to justice. I only pray that when the time comes, justice may be tempered with Mercy. It is evident from the above that the act was done in a fit of juvenile passion and not of malice aforethought. I hope and trust that the public will not be remiss in coming forward to save the poor boy from unnecessary severity.

"THE LOST RING."

Carry gentle reader your imagination a century and a half back, when the sun of Clive's genius was just rising in the horizon of fame and when the sky of India was overcast with clouds. In Bengal the able and prudent Ali Verdi had just died and the sceptre had passed to his "spoiled grand child." At that time lived in the busiest quarter of the town of Moorshedabad, a Mukim-elect to their Highnesses, the Nawabs. He was a man popularly believed to be rich as Cræsus and his articles were quite objects of admiration and boast in the zenanas. No wonder that reports of his wealth reached the ears of the ruling Nawab, leading the Prince to covet in secret the subject's colossal fortune. Only the too alarming news of Clive auté portus gave him far other occupation and he therefore waived his intentions for the present. But soon an opportunity presented itself. One of the Nawab's Secretaries had taken a Christian lady for his wife, and she was very handsome. Then it followed as a natural sequence that offices and honours were lavished on the husband for the very reason that Siraj became a slave to the captivating charms of the lady. From what we have said it is evident that she had a strong hold on the Nawab's mind. To her were now turned his eyes and he bethought himself of making her his instrument in carrying out his long-cherished aims.

One gay summer evening, a richly liveried chaise of four-in-hand, apparently of the Prince's stable, pulled up before the gates of the Mukim Bahadur. In the twinkling of an eye, a man in military costume alighted and helped a lady, a perfect blondé of resplendent beauty, out of the carriage. In swan-like gait the lady, hand-in-hand with the man in whiskers, began ascending the steps of the grand staircase in front of the building. The Mukim in great hurry and excitement ran out to meet the happy pair half way down. There making a low and prostrate salaam, peculiar only among the Orientals, he escorted the twain round the whole edifice and conducted them into the great hall, where lay temptingly displayed the hoarded "wealth of Ormuz and of Ind." To give an adequate idea, or to attempt it even, of the splendour of that hall would beggar even a bold poet's imagination. They, after closely inspecting the whole collection for many hours, made purchases of bijouterie of no considerable price, and left the premises much gratified and in excellent humour, after promising to call again shortly. The Mukim was much honoured by their short visit and was quite out of himself with joy. It is quite ludicrous to state that the Mukim in his grey hairs was deluded by the sweet smiles of rosy lips—alas! the delusive smile that had once ruined old Adam and brought woe to this earth. In his ecstasies he forgot to make an inventory of the articles sold that evening.

O how soon time fleets away! Months followed months in rapid succession. It is six months since, one evening the Mukim suddenly found himself to be the happiest mortal under the sun. But as Dame Nature has enunciated the great laws of action and reaction and as every act has its counterpart, so obeying Nature's behest, grief follows joy as truly as joy succeeds sorrow. One day the Mukim found to his utter confusion and dismay that a diamond-ring "of the purest ray serene," the best of the lot, was missing. O what a fall! O what a change! From the happiest of mortals enjoying ethereal bliss, he began to consider himself to be the most miserable and unfortunate of created beings. He minutely searched all the corners but to no purpose. The city Kotwal was immediately communicated with. It now furnished the tavern with idle gossiping and wild conjectures for the whole week following, and the story getting distorted from mouth to mouth swelled to enormous proportions till at last the repeaters themselves gave it up apparently in disgust of repeating it too often and as quite stale. As goes the proverb "after storm comes a lull," so it happened now. People began to forget all about it, in process of time. But meanwhile the Kotwal was not idle. He had employed many smart hands to trace the whereabouts of the culprits and to bring them, if possible, to justice. One of these, a Feringhee, and more shrewd than the rest, had hit upon a capital idea. He began his researches in quarters where success was least possible or dreamt of. He well disguised himself as a Mogul, made friends with the eunuch guards of the Nawab's Harem. It so happened one day that he picked up some stray hints from the unguarded chat of these quite innocent and unsuspecting creatures. He more than ever persevered in those quarters with redoubled energy and vigilance, until his labours were completely crowned with success and he was chiefly instrumental in unravelling one of the most enshrouded mysteries that is ever recorded. A decent looking Mogul chuprasî, one bright morn, ushered himself into the arcana of our well-known happy pair, who were lounging listlessly in their drawing-room, a perfect fairy land in miniature. He making low salaams presented them a bill, in the name of such and such Mukim for payment. A moment's examination of the contents made them stagger back a little and stare at each other. A silence prevailed. It was long before they recovered from their utter surprise. In the meantime, the quasi Mogul was surveying them from the corner of his eyes. His look met theirs which made them draw back again. After they had recovered sufficiently, the lady with an arch smile playing on her lips, slowly approaching the detective, took a ring out of her fair fingers, and handed the same to the supposed chuprasî remarking that, as they were not apprised of its high price till very then, they have no mind to retain it any more. The man snatching the ring—the identical "lost ring"—returned back, in great triumph, to his master the kotwal. The latter returned the same to its owner, pressing him, however, to prosecute the parties before a court of justice. He with his characteristic timidity stubbornly refused to comply. In the event of his consenting, it is doubtful whether he would have been able to bring the culprits to grief, for the apparent reason of the law being in their own hands, and moreover he would have to run a considerable risk of losing the Prince's favour.

Now that our hero did not push his case further, it but behoves us we shall drop the curtain here. Thus ended the story of the mysterious lost ring.

We cannot well conclude this without unconditionally apologising to those of our readers of the fair sex who may consider their susceptibilities wounded and their weak vanities brought to light in bold relief by the present authentic narrative.

Next must we apologise to those who may be deluded by the title of the story—"The Lost Ring"—and who may expect to find in it something akin to the immortal story of the Lost Ring of the towering genius of Kalidasa. Last we must ask pardon of the shade of Kalidasa, for the seeming presumption involved in our title.

An Old Official Paper.

ACQUISITION OF SURPLUS LAND FOR RESALE TO PAY THE COST OF NEW STREETS.

From the Secretary to the Commissioners for the improvement of the Town of Calcutta.

To W. Grey, Esq., Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal.

15th. The portions of land marked G and C belong to the same proprietors. After the verdict obtained in the case of the portion F on the 23rd March, the Commissioners instructed their Solicitors to serve notice for purchase of the portion G, 200 feet in width, but offering to take the whole of the remainder of the plot to the West. Further proceedings however were not taken till the receipt of the Government letter of the 8th of June No. 1023 conveying the sanction of His Honor to the purchase of the further portions C. and D. for the purposes of the Gas Company, the portion C, belonging to the same proprietor, as the portion G, the Commissioners directed their Solicitors to issue a fresh notice including so much of G as is tinted on the plan 200 feet wide, and referred to in the reference, with the portion C, so as to proceed with the whole case under one process.

The notice was accordingly served on the 27th June 1855, a reply was received from the proprietor's Solicitors dated 12th July naming Rupees 300 per Cottah, as the price at which they were willing to dispose of the land, and intimating that in the event of the Commissioners declining to give this rate, they desired that the settlement of compensation should be referred to a Special Jury. On the 29th September the Commissioners' Solicitors offered Rupees 175 per Cottah, for the whole of the land, assuming the average of the whole between Rupees 150 and Rupees 200 for different portions, no reply being received, the warrant to the Sheriff for summoning a Special Jury was delivered on the 3rd October, and afterwards withdrawn in consequence of the interference of the Doorga Poojah Holidays.

A letter was received from the proprietor's Solicitors on the 4th

October offering to sell to the Commissioners the portion of land (C) at Rupees 175 per Cottah, but they could not accept that offer as regarded (G); on the 2nd November steps were taken by the Commissioners' Solicitors for the summoning of a Special Jury, and on the 7th November the Surveyor, as the representative of the Commissioners, attended at the office of the Sheriff, with the representatives of the opposite party, to agree upon eight Jurymen for the purpose of the enquiry, this having been done, a meeting of the Special Jury was arranged for the 17th November, and afterwards postponed for their convenience till the 24th; a further postponement for the convenience of the Sheriff took place to the 12th December, when the verdict of the Jury was given, fixing the price of the whole of the land at Rupees 175 per Cottah, this being the exact amount which had been offered by the Commissioners.

The Commissioners on receipt of this information, immediately directed their Solicitors to take the necessary steps for obtaining possession, and on the 19th paid Rupees 160 fees for the Special Jury in the case. On the 26th of December the Commissioners were informed by the proprietor's Solicitors, that it was intended to move the Court to quash the inquisition before the Sheriff on three grounds, as will be seen by the annexed copy of the judgment delivered in the case, as published in the Hurkaru newspaper dated 13th February 1856 (reproduced in Reis and Rayyet of the 31st May, 1890), the chief of which however appeared to be, that no such consent as is contemplated in the Act had been given by His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, and also that no such consent could be regularly given, inasmuch as the Commissioners in taking these lands, for the purpose of dealing as they proposed to deal with them, were acting in excess of the powers vested in them by the Acts.

On the 8th February 1856 the cause came on in the Supreme Court when the Chief Justice delivered the judgment of which a copy is annexed, by which the rule Nisi was made absolute with costs, in other words the inquisition of the Sheriff was quashed, and the whole proceeding declared informal ab initio and the right of taking land in excess of the bare width of the street denied.

16th. It is to this fact, in connection with the other cases which the Commissioners have had in hand,—but more especially as to the bearing of the decision on Municipal Improvements generally, that I am directed to draw the special attention of His Honor, and to solicit his interference to endeavour to amend the Law.

17th. It is with respect to the carrying out the instructions of Government contained in the correspondence noted in the margin (Commissioners' letter No. 1872 dated 1st June 1855,) for the purchase of the remaining portions of land required for the Gas Company's works that the Commissioners are now chiefly anxious, in prosecuting this new thoroughfare, the further portion C is still required for this purpose (Government letter No. 1023 dated 8th June 1855); but with the recent decision of the Supreme Court before them, the Commissioners do not feel justified in again endeavouring to procure this, or any other land, by putting in force the powers of the Act 22 of 1847, which has proved so utterly insufficient for the purpose; they desire therefore to lay the whole case before Government in its present position with a view to immediate and radical correction.

18th. So far as the proposed street is concerned the Commissioners believe, with the present law which is said to prohibit the taking of a frontage for any purpose whatever, that any further attempt will be a useless waste of the public funds, and they have therefore directed their Solicitors to stop all further proceedings pending the passing of a new Act.

19th. This then is the result of the endeavours of the Commissioners extending from the 28th December 1854 to February 1856 upwards of a year, during that period the Act 22 of 1847 has been put in force, in all the various modes of procedure of which it is susceptible, viz., by submission to petty Jury, special Jury, arbitration, and amicable negotiation. In these several cases, (the statement of which is abbreviated as much as possible) the amount of labour has been very considerable, and the delay arising from various causes incidental to the peculiar tenure of property in this country, and more especially to the operation of this Act 22 of 1847, has been productive of the most serious vexation and annoyance. A large portion of the time of the Commissioners and of their officers, has been given to the several cases, the Surveyor in particular, the Chief Executive officer of the Conservancy has been required to devote so much time to these cases as, to a considerable extent, to deprive the usual operations of the conservancy of his valuable superintendence which is so necessary to their proper execution. The estimated outlay for a great and bona fide public improvement, amounting to upwards of one lac of Rupees has been resisted and frustrated, and all works of a similar character cannot of necessity be proceeded with.

20th. The time required for negotiating the purchase of any given parcel of land appears never to be less than from 5 to 6 months, and even then, possession to commence public works cannot be obtained, while the legal expences, where the plots are small equal, and even exceed, the purchase of the land—and for larger parcels, the costs bear a considerable proportion thereto. The costs in fact are as large for obtaining one Cottah, as for ten Biggahs of land, all this the Commissioners submit to be utterly obstructive to progress, and to improvement, and to carrying out the provisions of the Act for which they were appointed.

21st. As before stated this portion of the proposed new street, to extend the whole length of the Town, was selected as less expensive, and offering fewer difficulties than any other part of the line; it is in fact merely covered with huts, there is no reason to hope therefore, that any further attempts of a similar nature in any part of the town, would afford better results than these now attained; but there is every reason to fear that the success attending the present opposition, would increase the difficulties the Commissioners would have to contend with. The project after the outlay of Rs. 28,552 must therefore for the present be abandoned. (This amount does not include the costs incurred in the case of the land C and G.)

22nd. As Commissioners for the Improvement of Calcutta I am directed to state, the Board are of opinion, that the opening out of new streets and improving existing ones, is a duty they are called on to perform, second only in importance to the complete and efficient drainage of the town; this latter is really a matter of life and death; the former, while having a direct influence in improving its sanitary condition, by improved ventilation, will be imperative in several instances if a new general system of drainage is to be carried out, and is most desirable for the convenience of traffic, and for the general beauty of this metropolis of India. To make new streets without securing some sort of arrangement for building leases, and thus obtaining respectable and decent frontages, seems to the Commissioners to be preposterous, of what public benefit or sanitary improvement they ask would it be to make a road 100 feet wide, from Colootollah to Machaooa Bazar Street, leaving the sides in their present filthy disreputable state, or to be made even worse perhaps at the option of the owners? It is not in their judgment either expedient or equitable that a few miserable hovels along the sides of a splendid opening should reap the whole of the advantage of the outlay. The enhanced value of the frontages, bought with the town funds should become the property of the town for public purposes of an approved character; and unless this principle can be carried out Calcutta must remain as it is, and the Fund saved after much economy and forethought, turned to other objects.

23rd. It is beyond question, that of all parties benefited by the opening out of a new street, those through whose property the improvement is carried, derived infinitely greater advantage by the increased value given to their surrounding property than any other portion of the public. By the operation of the present law, which according to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, it appears does not give power to the Commissioners to take and resell land for frontages, or even to take and to retain it, imposes on the public generally, the entire and excessive cost, of the purchase of the land, from those very individuals who are most benefited by the improvement; this the Commissioners submit is unjust to the general public, and entirely obstructive to all future progress on works of this nature.

24th. For these reasons the Commissioners earnestly and respectfully request that steps may be taken to enact an entirely new law, for the procuring of land for public purposes; that to avoid delay after the expiration of a reasonable notice for purchase is given, they should be empowered to take possession, leaving the settlement of compensation, &c., for after adjustment; and that when taking land they should have power to take, not only the actual quantity for the street surface, but also an additional portion within fixed limits on either side of the Street, with sufficient frontage for resale under such conditions as they may choose to impose for the improvement of this city, as is the case in all other European towns, and without which no improvements can be made. This subject has been repeatedly (more particularly in their letter No. 1448 dated 29 June 1854, and in letter No. 2234 dated 15 Dec. 1855 para. 7 forwarding their Report and the new Conservancy Bill), and recently urged upon the consideration of Government, but the Commissioners again address His Honor thereon, feeling certain that the experience of the operation of the present law, will shew its utter insufficiency for carrying out public improvements.

25th. In conclusion, the Commissioners observe that in the proposed resale of lands for the benefit of the public, there is nothing new. It is a practice which they understand is followed in carrying out improvements in the Metropolis both of England and France, and the secret of success in both these instances, forced sales of property should, and will ever obtain for the proprietors a liberal compensation; and with this opinion, the Commissioners would again ask for a law, which while it made this liberal compensation to all individuals affected by its operation, yet should overrule their right so to use, or withhold their property as to prevent the public good.

I have the honor to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
(Sd.) W. CLARK.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News, October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

Acting Superintendent, Government Farm, Khandesh, says:—"A watch maker has valued your Rs. 7-8 watch for Rs. 15." Mr. J. Sutcliffe, R. W. Fusi, Regt., Lucknow, says:—"Some valued it at Rs. 15 and were completely surprised when I told them it only costs Rs. 7-8." Pretty Candian Gold Chains, Lockets, Pencils, complete shirt Studs and Rings set with scientific diamonds, rubies, &c., at Rs. 2 each. Mr. J. A. Yelmore, Satur, says:—"The best goldsmith of this place values the chain for Rs. 7 and the locket for Rs. 10." Mr. G. Smith, Salt Inspector, Sanikutla, says:—"A German valued the diamond ring at Rs. 50 and the ruby at Rs. 30." WESTERN INDIA TRADING CO., BOMBAY.

JEYES' DISINFECTANTS:

The best and cheapest Antiseptics, Deodorizers and Cleansers.

Jeeyes' Perfect Purifier

supersedes Carbolic and other Disinfectants, being much more efficacious, non-poisonous, non-corrosive, stainless in use, and cheaper. Prevents contagion by destroying its cause. Instantly removes bad smells. It is an almost unfailing cure for Eczema and other Skin Diseases; and is the best known Insecticide.

Can be had in the various forms of Liquid, Powder, Soap and Ointment.

JEYES' PERFECT PURIFIER

prevents infection by destroying its cause, killing the very germs of contagious diseases. It removes instantly all noxious smells, not by temporarily disguising them (as is often the case), but by chemical combination, substituting instantaneously for a poisonous a pure and healthy atmosphere, and thoroughly eradicating the evil.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE BOAT HORN.

BY WM. O. BUTLER.

O, BOATMAN! wind that horn again,
For never did the list'ning air
Upon its joyous bosom bear
So wild, so soft, so sweet a strain!
What though thy notes are sad and few,
By every simple boatman blown,
Yet is each pulse to nature true,
And melody in every tone.
How oft in boyhood's joyous day,
Unmindful of the lapsing hours,
I've loitered on my homeward way
By wild Ohio's brink of flowers,
While some lone boatman from the deck—
Poured his soft numbers to that tide,
As if to charm from storm and wreck
The boat where all his fortunes ride!
• Delighted Nature drank the sound,
Enchanted Echo bore it round
In whispers soft and softer still,
From hill to plain and plain to hill,
Till e'en the thoughtless, frolic boy,
Elate with hope and wild with joy,
Who gambolled by the river's side,
And sported with the fretting tide,
Felt something new pervade his breast,
Change his light step, repress his jest,
Bent o'er the flood his eager ear
To catch the sounds far off, yet dear—
Drank the sweet draught, but knew not why
• The tear of rapture filled his eye.
And can he now, to manhood grown,
Tell why those notes, simple and lone
• As on the ravished ear they fell,
Bound every sense in magic spell?
There is a tide of feeling given
To all on earth, its fountain heaven,
Beginning with the dewy flower,
Just oped in Flora's vernal bower—
• Rising creation's orders though
With louder murmur, brighter hue—
That tide is sympathy! its ebb and flow
Gives life its hues, its joy and woe.
Music, the master-spirit that can move
Its waves to war, or lull them into love—
Can cheer the sinking sailor mid the wave,
And bid the soldier on! nor fear the grave—
Inspire the fainting pilgrim on his road,
And elevate his soul to claim his God.

Then, boatman! wind that horn again!
Though much of sorrow mark its strain,
Yet are its notes to sorrow dear;
What though they wake fond memory's tear!
Tears are sad memory's sacred feast,
And rapture oft her chosen guest.

LOVE IN SORROW.

WHAT shall I do for thee? Thou hast my prayers,
Ceaseless as stars around the great white throne;
No passing angel but to heaven bears
Thy name, wreathed round with some sweet orison;
Yet evil on thy path may come and go,
Taking deliberate aim to lay thee low,
While I stand still, a looker-on, to prove
The penury and silence of my love!

How can I comfort thee? my tears are thine;
Full duteously upon thy griefs they wait;
If thou art wronged, the bitterness is mine,
If thou art lonely, I am desolate;
Yet still upon thy brow the darkness lies,
Still the drops gather in thy plaintive eyes,
The nails are sharp, the cross weighs heavily—
I cannot weep away one pang for thee!

The midnight deepens—and I cannot guide;
The tempest threatens—and I cannot shield;
I must behold thee wounded, tempted, tried,
Oh, agony—I may behold thee yield!
What boots that altar in my heart, whereon
Thy royal image stands, unbreathed upon,
And pure, and guarded from irreverent glance,
With a so vainly jealous vigilance?

Oh, were this all! But no—I have the power
To grieve thee by unwary tone or deed,
Or, niggard in my fear, to miss the hour
For comforting with hope thy time of need,
To hide, too shyly, half the love I feel,
Too roughly touch the wound I seek to heal,
Or even, (oh, pardon!) wayward and unjust,
To wrong thee by some moment of mistrust.

Yet I would die for thee, and thou for me;
We know this of each other, and forgive
Those tremblings of our frail mortality,
So prompt to die, yet so afraid to live.
Lift we our eyes to heaven! Love greets us thence Disrobed of its earthly impotence,
Even human love—below, still doomed to be Stronger than death, feebler than infancy!

BENEATH THE WAYSIDE TREE.

BENEATH the wayside tree
 A pale one sat and sang her tale :—
 "The gorse upon the common blooms, the clover on the lea ;
 That Love should bud and fail !
 "I had a lover true,
 But now he's gone far, far away ;
 And the new things have grown old, and from the old things have sprung new,
 Since last he came this way."
 "Let the new things grow old,
 From old things let new spring again !
 True love is neither new nor old, one ever—for, behold !
 I love thee now as then !"
 His frame was no more young,
 Wrinkled his brow, his hair grown gray ;
 Yet round him not less tenderly her arms the pale one flung ;
 And life for both once more was May.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE weather is seasonable—with a vengeance. The rains are in full swing all over Bengal and Upper India. Here we have been completely drenched.

A CORRESPONDENT from Jhang writes to the Civil and Military Gazette :—

"You extend your sympathy to Jacobabad, but what about us? Temperature on 16th at 10 P.M. 106! We are not shown in the weather report. Has science failed to construct instruments to record such high temperatures, or does Government fear their publication making the task of finding our successor too difficult? Rain since October last something under an inch! Railway distant some 60 miles. Intervening journey a perfect nightmare of horrors. Two of us started on a few days' leave, went 20 miles and had to return. We could not face the hot wind, though it was about midnight."

That is a very Purgatory to be sure. But Hell is not far off in the same direction, if the travellers to Central Asia from Burnes downwards may be believed.

THE Port Officer has advised the commanders of vessels in the port not to permit their officers and men "to bathe in the river, as, besides the treacherous under-currents, there are numerous sharks and alligators that lay under the banks on the off chance of getting a victim." The warning concerns a far wider circle than those formally addressed. We all had better forego the pleasure of a swim in the cool water in the present season.

BAD news for the gods and goddesses of fashion up in the Hills. His Highness of Cooch Behar will not enliven Simla this season. We only hope this means no failure of health in our young and amiable Chief.

WE learn from the Pioneer :—

"The Maharaja of Patiala has bought the racing pony Little Wonder II., which supposed (sic) to have a chance for the Civil Service Cup."

THE new Civilization is introducing new crimes among us. One of the most notable is suicide by boys and young men disappointed in educational examinations. On the publication, lately, of the results of the last University examination, there have occurred some deaths of the kind among students in Calcutta and other places in Bengal. All the three suicides in Calcutta, mentioned in the papers, were plucked in the First Arts.

A CORRESPONDENT in the Morning Post brings into prominence the remarkable success of a Bengali in the last Calcutta and Allahabad Examinations. Sarat Chunder, son of Rai Aubinash Chunder Banerjee Bahadar, Subordinate Judge of Agra, has passed with highest Honors the last B. A. Examination in both the Universities. The Calcutta Examination commenced on the 17th March and that of the Allahabad on the 24th, the text books being different. The father may well be proud of such a prodigious boy. We only hope the progress made by the boy in his studies is real and substantial and not simply to "pass."

A REMARKABLE case of self-immolation has just taken place at Palghat, Madras. It was in essence a suicide of a broken heart—and in the modus operandi a male suttee. A poor Nair had loved above him and, disappointed in winning the forbidden fair one, burnt himself to death on the burning pyre, after the regular Indian manner.

IN Trichinopoly, they wanted to try vaccination with assinine lymph. But our Southern brethren would have none of it. Benighted though they are called, they have too much self-respect to introduce anything subhuman into their blood. The Sanitary Commissioner reports that some castes look upon the donkey as an unclean animal and a goddess of ill-luck, and if its lymph is persisted in, it will render vaccination which is already unpopular more difficult. That is all nonsense. The Trichinopolitans only object to embruit themselves and their race. And very properly so.

THE new phase of Woman Emancipation in the New World, is bicycling, locally called coasting. There is already a school for the purpose in St. Louis. The course consists of three lessons only. Ladies do not mind riding twenty miles a day and find coasting gentler, pleasanter and more invigorating than any other mode of conveyance.

A HINDOO Purdasee at Bombay took a fancy to a Banya boy of 12 in his neighbourhood, and took him, unknown to his guardians, to Surat and other places and fed and clothed him and felt himself happy. For his fancy he was prosecuted for kidnapping. The Purdasee pleaded guilty, and the Magistrate sentenced him to one year's rigorous imprisonment!

A SUB-ACCOUNT clerk at the Aligarh Post Office, Baldeo Charn, has been sentenced by the Sessions Judge to seven years' rigorous imprisonment for embezzling Rs. 750. There are other charges regarding other sums amounting to Rs. 6,900, but the Judge thinks Baldeo has been sufficiently punished, and has accordingly applied for permission of the High Court to drop the other charges.

THE European manager of Marcks and Co., Limited, watchmakers, jewellers, &c., Poona, is charged with misappropriation of a large sum of money in the Cantonment Magistrate's Court. On the case being called, the defendant did not enter appearance, but an application on his behalf was made for adjournment on account of his illness. The Magistrate enquired when would Burby be well and, being informed in about a week's time, readily assented to the postponement. But which is the next day to be fixed? "Mr. Merwanjee: Thursday, 26, will suit both my learned friend and myself. Mr. Gungram Bhao: The reporters of the press say that the day will not suit them, as it is the day on which Lord Harris will make his first appearance on the cricket field and they think it ought to be a general holiday. His Worship: I am sorry I cannot meet the gentlemen's wishes, I would like a holiday myself, but I am afraid I cannot take it."

"While a Mr. Lyford was bathing at Bentota, his hand came in contact with one of these medusæ, and he immediately felt a twinge. The back of the hand soon afterwards began to swell, and was covered with large blisters. For about three days there was no pain. After that, great pain was felt, then the swelling subsided, and the hand recovered its full usual strength, but not so the fingers; though they look all right, there is a numbness about them, which is very uncomfortable, and a sensation like an electric shock is felt right up to the shoulder when the tips of the fingers come into contact with anything, especially steel, although about a month has elapsed since the contact occurred."

A CHAMAR woman after living for some years with her husband, of the same caste, gave him up, betook herself to Mahomedanism and was taken as a wife by a Mahomedan, Kareem by name. The new union too proved unhappy and the wife preferred to live separate from the husband. But Kareem had not ceased to regard her as his wife, and one day, finding a coreligionist, Faizoo, with his Bebee charged him with adultery. The Cantonment Magistrate of Mhow found Faizoo guilty, convicted him and sentenced him to six months' imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 50. There was an appeal to the Judge of the Appellate Court at Indore. The case was argued by Khan Bahadur Khory, and Mr. Tucker quashed the conviction and acquitted Faizoo. The point contended for was that Kaveem the complainant was no husband of the woman, and that, under a ruling of the Bombay High Court, the second marriage of the woman in the life-time of the first husband, was void, it being bigamy.

THE Lofoten (Norway) cod fishery has closed. The season has been highly fruitful. Thirty millions of fish have been taken valued at 7,250,000 crowns. The number of fishermen engaged is given at 30,324.

A LONDON paper says:—

"It is being observed with great satisfaction by philanthropists that there is a very marked falling off in the prison population of the country during the past decade. Out of 113 prisons, no fewer than 57 have been altogether closed. Male prisoners are fewer by 28 per cent; females by some 45 per cent. A noticeable decrease has taken place also in the number of children under 16 years committed to gaol. The importance of this last fact is only realised by those who remember that it is an ascertained fact that there is scarcely an habitual criminal in the country who has not been imprisoned as a child. Many of those who make up the prison statistics are persons of drunken and disorderly habits, of whom one recently said: 'I'd sooner be in prison than outside it; the food is better, and the work nothing like so hard.'"

Is this the effect of education? When the first measures for diffusing instruction among the people were taken, in the earlier years of the Long Peace, there followed a large accession of crime.

MR. Mackenzie, the Chief Commissioner of the Central Provinces, is for raising the age all round for the Civil Service. But, following Sir T. C. Hope, he thinks there should be a limit to the number of natives in the Service, and that now rather than hereafter, when it might be considered invidious. He fears that the raising of the age, without such a limit, would overstock the Imperial Service with educated Natives with "fantastic conceptions of progress" to the prejudice of "the safety of the Empire and perpetuation in the administration of Western ideas and modern civilization."

ANOTHER fire from spontaneous combustion broke out on Thursday night at Bombay—at the Jewraj Balloo Mill at Tardeo. The fire was quickly put down. The damage is given at Rs. 10,000.

THERE was a foot race at Poona on the 26th, between Corporal Sawyer, of the Royal Fusiliers, and Private Homer, of the Worcester Regiment. Distance 135 yards, and stakes one thousand rupees a side. Homer won.

LADY Lansdowne goes to England on a short visit, leaving Bombay on the 18th July and returning before the Season in Calcutta.

EARLY in August, Lord Lansdowne goes on an excursion along the Thibet Road for some days. He may go up to Chini.

Holloway's Pills.—Any dyspeptic sufferer aware of the purifying, regulating, and gently aperient powers of these Pills, should permit no one to cloud his judgment or to warp his course. With a box of Holloway's Pills, and attention to its accompanying "Directions," he may feel thoroughly satisfied that he can safely and effectually release himself from his miseries without impairing his appetite or weakening his digestion. This most excellent medicine acts as a nervine and bodily tonic by aiding nutrition, and banishes a thousand and an oying forms of nervous complaints. An occasional resort to Holloway's remedy will prove highly salutary to all persons, whether well or ill, whose digestion is slow or imperfect, a condition usually evinced by weariness, languor, listlessness, and despondency.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

REPORTS have reached Cairo that Osman Digma's army has left Tokar, marching northwards.

As an evidence of august satisfaction at the last Anglo-German convention regarding Africa, Emperor William has decorated Count Hatzfeldt with the Order of the Black Eagle. Major Wissman has been ennobled too.

Prince Bismarck disapproves of the English protectorate over Zanzibar, as prejudicial to the German element there. The German Colonial Company is dissatisfied with it too, as is manifest from its abandonment of the idea of a banquet to the Major for his services.

France objected to the English protectorate over Zanzibar as against the Anglo-French Convention of 1862. There was correspondence between the two Cabinets. The explanations are supposed to be satisfactory. Does that explain the seizure by the British Cruiser Emerald of the two British lobster factories in Newfoundland, on the ground that their continuance would be a violation of the modus vivendi with France?

Mr. Monro having resigned and not been taken back as was once hinted, Sir Edward Bradford has succeeded as Chief Commissioner of the London Police, his place in the India Office in the Political and Secret Section being filled by Major General Samuel Black, Bengal Staff Corps.

Major Panitza has not succeeded in his appeal against the sentence of death.

There is trouble again in Armenia. A serious revolt is reported. There have been several engagements between the Kurds and Armenians, and many persons killed.

The Brazilian charter granting a federal system of government has been proclaimed.

Owing to obstruction, Government has withdrawn the clause in the Licensing or Local Taxation Bill empowering County Councils to purchase and extinguish licenses, and put in a clause allowing the sums voted for that purpose to accumulate until Parliament lays down the way for its appropriation. That is encouraging perpetuity, so opposed to the spirit of modern legislation. The publicans in the meantime have been assured that the money so accumulating under the amended Bill will be applied to no other purpose than the extinction of licenses. A later telegram says that the Speaker has ruled that the Government proposal of the perpetuating clause is without precedent. The Cabinet has now decided to withdraw all the licensing clauses of the Bill.

The American Silver Bill keeps on moving backwards and forwards. The Comage Committee having reported against them, the House of Representatives rejected the amendments made by the Senate, and sent the Bill back with a request to replace it before the Conference Committee of both Houses.

Sarah Bernhardt had overdosed herself with chloral after a performance. With great difficulty she could be brought back to consciousness.—A few years back she would, in all probability, have taken a dose of chlorodyne. Even angels cannot do without stimulants and narcotics.

Prince Albert Victor, Duke of Clarence, retains direct connection with India. His Royal Highness has been Gazetted Honorary Colonel, 4th Bengal Cavalry.

The Central News Agency telegraphed on the 25th that "Romesh Chunder Mitter, of Calcutta, has received the honour of Knighthood." It has not explained what it means. The retired Judge is already a Knight.

Count Kalnoky is seriously ill of dysentery.

The President of the Republic of San Salvador, General Francisco Menindez, died suddenly after a banquet at the Capitol. There is suspicion of poisoning.

THE Turkish soldiery in the last war were supplied with saw-dust biscuits. But contractors are contractors all the world over, though doubtless there are contractors and contractors. Matters are scarcely better in Western Europe. What disclosures were made in France during the struggle for existence with Germany! These things are recalled by a question put in the British House of Commons on June 3.

It appears that during the late sports at Dover a British trooper broke his sword in striking at a lemon. It must be too finely tempered steel that becomes bisected in twain under the formidable resistance of a fruit like a fresh lemon. The Government did not deny the soft impeachment, but promised a full report which has been called for.

THE Scotsman complained of bad food supplied by the Commissariat Department in the Chin-Lushai expedition. The Commissary General-in-Chief has now reported on the matter. He finds that the unfavorable reports are gross exaggerations, and have little or no foundation in fact. The stores were already condemned by the Commissariat Department, before the troops could be reduced to inferior rations. Under the system followed it could not be otherwise and it was so as a fact. All the condemned articles were replaced by good ones before distribution. The Major-General Commanding the Burma District bears high testimony to the Commissariat arrangements. He is of opinion that never in any campaign of like difficulty had the troops fared better.

THE $4\frac{1}{2}$ Per Cent. Loan of 1878 and the Transfer Loan of 1879, $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. portion including the $4\frac{1}{2}$ Per Cent. Loan of 1880, mature on the 15th September 1893. They will be discharged at par on that date. But three months' notice of repayment must be given on the 15th June 1893. At the same time, it is left to the holders to have their holdings transferred into the ordinary 4 per cent. Loans. The Government of India have accordingly authorized the Public Debt Office, Bank of Bengal, Calcutta until 30th December 1890 to deliver 4 per cent. Promissory Notes or Stock Certificates in exchange for $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities of the above loans upon the following terms:—

"(1) Rs. 100 of 4 per cent. Promissory Notes or Stock Certificates will be delivered for every Rs. 100 of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities received, and any interest (accrued and not already paid) on the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities up to the last preceding half-yearly date for the payment of interest, and also the excess interest payable upon them up to the date of maturity (15th September 1893), will be paid in cash. This excess in the case of Securities on which interest has been drawn up to 14th March 1890 is Re. 1-12-0 per cent.

(2) The Promissory Notes or Stock Certificates delivered will be of the Loan of 1854-55, and interest will run upon them from the half-yearly date of that loan next following the last half-yearly date of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ Per Cent. Loan (namely, 30th June if the Securities are presented for conversion between 15th March and 14th September, and 31st December if presented between 15th September and 30th December).

(3) Anticipation interest at 4 per cent. will be paid for the period (3 months and 15 days) between the last half-yearly date for payment of interest upon the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Securities received, and the date from which the interest will run upon the Promissory Notes delivered in exchange. The amount of this anticipation interest is Re. 1-2-8 per cent.

(4) A brokerage of 4 annas per cent. will be paid to the person who tenders the Securities.

(5) The Securities tendered for transfer should be receipted in the following form:

Received in lieu of this note a note of the same value of the 4 Per Cent. Loan of 1854-55 bearing interest from 30th June 1890 (or 31st December 1890 if tendered after 14th September 1890)."

THE papers relating to the Chota Nagpore agrarian disputes trace those disputes to almost an ancient date. They have taxed all the resources of successive rulers of Bengal. The best revenue officers at their disposal have been deputed to cope with the work. The highest officials have brought their personal influence to bear on the contending parties towards a pacification of the difficulty. Leniency and sternness have both been resorted to. Surveys and registration of lands with enquiries into the various kinds and classes of rights claimed therein have been, for a long course of years, in progress at great expense and trouble. The present Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal has personally visited the district and conferred with landlords as well as tenants, and endeavoured to reconcile their differences. But all to little purpose. The differences seem to be irreconcilable, and the worst feelings continue to prevail between the two classes.

We have been led to these remarks by a letter which appears in the Englishman of the 17th instant, reporting an explosion of the pent-up feelings which exist between the landlords of Chota Nagpore and the Roman Catholic supporters of the Kolh tenantry. Here is the letter:—

"RANCHI, JUNE 11.

It is now two months since his Honor the Lieutenant-Governor made his tour through the Lohardugga district, leaving behind him, as all fondly thought, a track of peace and quietude. Late events, however, go to show that one village at least is not in as happy a state as it might be. There is a small colony of Roman Catholic teachers (German) near Mandu, and two of them have been in the habit for some time past of daily teaching in the village. After they had left their pupils on the 22nd of May last, the zemindar of the village and some of his people beat two of their pupils severely, and the next day when the teachers arrived he turned them out of the village, saying that he would shoot them if they returned again.

On the following day, the priest himself, accompanied by his teachers and others, proceeded to the village and found the zemindar seated in the verandah of his house surrounded by several villagers. Words passed between them, and eventually the priest turned to go away. No sooner was his back turned than the zemindar took up a gun and covered him. Fortunately some one warned the priest, and he immediately dismounted and called for his Winchester. I forgot to mention that he had two guns and a revolver with him, besides the Winchester rifle. It appears that the two fired simultaneously, the priest's bullet lodging in the wall and the zemindar's pellets taking effect in the priest's arm, chin, and sola topee.

By this time all had made themselves scarce except the priest, who, seeing a head suddenly appear round the corner of a pillar, promptly fired, and, as it turned out eventually, wounded the zemindar's brother in the upper part of the arm. What happened after this appears to be a matter of some doubt, as everyone has his own tale. So we must leave it for the trial, which is now proceeding, to divulge.

What effect this event will have on the district it is hard to say, but it is to be hoped that the guilty party will receive such a punishment as will prevent anything of the kind recurring. The case has been investigated by Mr. Dawson and Mr. Byrne of the Police, and the trial is now proceeding before Mr. O'Brien, C.S.—BOV."

It is telegraphed from Poona that Mr. Scott, of the Deccan Brewery Company, was drowned on Wednesday evening in one of the vats. Dr. Barnes, of Kukee, ascribes the death to asphyxia due to the large amount of carbonic acid gas generated in the vat.

THAT accident reminds us that the stench from indigo vats is horrible too, and we wonder how those engaged in the process of the manufacture can stand it. In fact, many trades have processes equally offensive and deleterious. Perhaps the worst is gas manufacture. It has always been a marvel to us how men and animals manage to live in the immediate neighbourhood of gas works. Thus there is a considerable settlement of huts and poor dwellings and shops opposite the main works at Naikeldanga for the supply of this town. In what misery must the people pass their days in such a place! What must be the effect on their health of breathing such an atmosphere! Are they beyond the pale of protection of the Health Officer?

WE read—

"At Adelaide, South Australia, a gentleman who had resided for some years in India, gave an address on the country and its people. In the course of his remarks he said he had been vastly impressed by the enthusiasm for education displayed by even the poorest of the inhabitants, an enthusiasm which unfortunately had not any parallel either in England or the colonies, but something approximating to it existed in Scotland. In India a poor man having to support a family on an income of fifteen rupees a month would devote three rupees a month to the higher education of one of his sons."

What is stated about the British Islands is true enough, but of late years some parts of the European Continent beat the Scotch in the passion for education. In India, the cause of the phenomenon is simple. In this country, among both Hindus and Mahomedans, the poorest are usually the highest classes.

SOME one with more leisure than work has calculated that "One of the fastest writers among the public men of to-day is Admiral Porter, whose brain works like the wheel of a dynamo, throwing off sparks at every turn, and whose pencil rushes across the paper at almost a telegraphic speed. Admiral Porter wrote his history of the United States navy in eleven months, and during this time his average was at least 75,000 words a month, or nearly 2,500 words a day, including Sundays. The book is as big as a dictionary, and it contains from 700,000 to 800,000 words. During many of these days he did not write at all, and his average during his working period ran as high as 5,000 words a day."

That does not look to us—and we are rather slow coaches ourselves—a thundering outcome of extraordinary rapidity of mind. Many journalists habitually turn out as much literary matter. Of course, such literature is rarely of much consequence.

WE read:—

"Every one in the East knows how beautifully the rice is served, thoroughly cooked, yet the grains remaining separate and distinct, and not in a sodden mass, as is too often the case at home. The following recipe for cooking rice has been given by a skilful Japanese cook. It will be well to state that the Japanese rice pot is used only for cooking rice ; its peculiarity consists in a heavy wooden cover, which rests by its weight on the rim of the pot, so as to fit snugly, and yet allow the steam to force its way under it. The rice is first washed thoroughly in cold water, rubbing hard with the hand till all milkiness passes off and the water runs clear. It should then stand all night in water ; the three essentials :—1. The rice must be thoroughly washed, rubbing it hard in several waters before boiling. 2. The amount of water used in boiling the rice is the same, by measure as the amount of rice to be boiled—pint for pint ; or cup for cup. (It will be found almost impossible to cook a very small quantity of rice in this way) 3. When once the lid has been put on the pot, after stirring the rice into the boiling water, it must not be removed till it is ready to be served."

So there is hope for Europe when her sons show a respect for the rice—one of the most delicate, inoffensive, innocent and healthy meals—in every sense—in the world. As for serving it, Europeans—and Japanese too, we may add—have no idea of the elegant form in which cooked rice is in Bengal served for eating.

IN America they are riding the phonograph to—marriage. It is said,

"A man waited upon the minister with a phonograph. The minister spoke into the apparatus the questions and the bridegroom the responses of the marriage ceremony. The impression was then posted to the bride one hundred miles away, and she and the minister of her village went through the same process, the last minister pronouncing the couple man and wife."

That is the very reductio ad absurdum of the contractual form of marriage. We wonder how the Courts will regard it. We suppose it could not be recognised without a change in the law. We really expect a considerable alteration in the law in various directions to bring it into harmony with the progress of science and the arts of civilised life. Great changes must take place in particular in the procedure and the law of evidence. If a phonographic marriage is admissible, why not phonographic depositions? Such evidence would be a natural supplement to the provisions dispensing with the attendance in court of men of rank and veiled Oriental ladies. For the rest, we envy not those who cannot wait for a meeting to be united in the bonds of wedlock. We are not sure that we understand them. Do they hope to consummate by proxy through the medium of some Edisonian invention—some "internal machine"? They surely cannot have friends—they probably care for none. They who have no time to meet for marriage cannot have leisure for friendship or love, involving as either does the interchange of little attentions. They are too occupied for remembering God or man, to say nothing of duty to either. They are in too great a hurry to go to Heaven to all. If called, they would perhaps like to send a representative. They need not care—they may have unconsciously secured admission to another place.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JUNE 28, 1890.

SANITATION AND LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

SANITARY improvement continues to be unsatisfactory. The cause of this is chiefly financial, and the new policy adopted by the Local Government of granting loans on easy terms to public bodies for the prosecution of sanitary works, is intended to supply the necessary remedy. How far in the long run this system of giving loans will go in accomplishing the end in view, it is yet too early to say. For the present, it is satisfactory, however, to notice that during the present year Municipalities have applied in several cases for loans, and the Government is doing everything to encourage such applications. As regards municipal expenditure from current income for sanitary purposes, Dr. Gregg is far from satisfied. He remarks in his last report: "It will be seen that on the whole Municipal Commissioners are doing what they can to improve the sanitary condition of their towns; but although a good deal has been done, and is being done, I am again compelled to remark that in many cases municipal income is wasted on temporary works and on works of minor importance, while works of a more needed, substantial, and lasting nature, such as drainage, water-supply and public latrines are neglected."

The state of things as regards rural areas under the administration of the District Boards is still more unsatisfactory. The following remarks recorded by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal would seem to indicate that the imposition of a sanitary cess cannot be far off:—

"The Sanitary Commissioner's report does not touch on the work of sanitation under District Boards. The truth is that, although the promotion of sanitation is a duty entrusted under the Local Self-Government Act to District Boards, little or no progress is made in this direction, because the Boards possess no funds for the purpose. The Boards in Bengal are not vested with powers to impose local taxation to meet the requirements of local sanitation. And yet no grievance presses more hardly on the people than those which are created by the insanitary condition of the country. Constant complaints come to the notice of Government, through the vernacular press and elsewhere, of the necessity of improved drinking water, and in a hardly less degree of improved drainage, from almost every district of these provinces. The agency for the execution of sanitary reform in rural areas, and the means by which such reforms may be executed, are questions now under the consideration of Government."

The Sanitary Board has now been constituted. It consists of Sir Henry Harrison, Member of the Board of Revenue, as President, and Colonel Mc Neile, Chief Engineer and Secretary to Government in the Irrigation Branch of the Public Works Department, and Dr. Gregg, the Sanitary Commissioner, as members. A whole time officer will be placed at the disposal of the Board as Sanitary Engineer. This officer would be the right-hand man of the Sanitary Commissioner, accompanying him on his tours, working in concert and concurrence with him in the preparation of designs, plans, and estimates, guiding the municipalities in getting up projects, and doing inspection duty while the works are in progress. The Sanitary Board will be the executive agency through which the Government will act in the Sanitary Department, and Sir Stuart Bayley expresses a hope that, if judiciously worked, it will exercise a powerful initiative and a valuable control in all departments of sanitary work.

Financial and administrative help being thus provided by the Government, it remains for the local authorities to develop more efficiency of administration in themselves. So far their work in the Sanitary Department has not been much to their credit. Even in a comparatively simple matter like the keeping of vital statistics, they have been remarkably careless. The Sanitary Commissioner in his last report brings to the notice of Government certain facts in regard to the registration of these statistics in towns which are simply discreditable to the Municipal Commissioners. He says while the approximate standard of birth-rate in India is 40 per thousand, or perhaps even higher than this, there are no less than 15 Municipalities in which the statistics are so imperfectly recorded that the ratio is less than 10 per thousand. Among these is no less a favored municipality under the chairmanship of a pet of the district officers than the South Suburban Municipality, where the ratio is about 7. In four municipalities—Muktagacha, Jhalokati, Gobaridanga and Nasirabad—the rate is less than 5 per thousand. These, however, may be pardoned for their sequestered situation. But what are we to say when centres of intelligence, population and wealth like Dacca, Kishnaghur, Berhampur, Midnapore, Jessore, and Patna show no better results? Well may Dr. Gregg say that when the registration in important Municipalities, at the head quarters of districts, is still so defective, it is hopeless to attempt registration with any approximation to accuracy in rural areas.

Equally discouraging is the result of registration of deaths in Municipalities. The South-Suburban town is again conspicuous, says the Government, for its imperfect registration. These statistics in regard to many municipalities are utterly unreliable. It is rather curious how the results could so widely differ in two municipalities, touching each other geographically. The Government Resolution points out with dry humour that the two newly created Municipalities of Cossipore-Chitpore and Manicktolla, where, in the former case, a mortality is registered of 38.9 per thousand, and in the latter only 14.5 per thousand, afford a marked illustration of good and bad work in adjoining localities. And Manicktolla is a municipality which has always since its formation been jealously kept under an official Chairman.

Altogether, there is much room for improvement in the ways of our newly created municipalities. Failure in such elementary, though important, duties brings discredit on the system. Such mistakes as are now pointed out by the Sanitary Commissioner are certainly avoidable by diligence, and more attentive supervision of the work. The Municipal Commissioners cannot complain of the want of guidance and counsel from Government officers. The normal rates of birth and death are known things. The methods of going to work so as to approximate those rates are laid down by the Sanitary Department for their help. Dr. Gregg has been specially at great pains to teach them in this subject, and if still they fail, and what is more curious, are unconscious of their failure, the sooner they divest themselves of the ambition of shining as local somebodies, the better for the cause of Local Self-Government.

JAIL ADMINISTRATION IN BENGAL.

THE last was a busy year with the Jail Department in Bengal. Dr. Lethbridge had his hands quite full. The total number of admissions was the largest since 1879. The daily average number of convicts rose from 12,378 in 1888 to 13,591 in 1889. The increase is accounted for by the ruling high prices of food-grains leading to a large number of convictions for theft and other minor offences against property. In support of this view, a statement of offences against property in the Patna Division, in which considerable scarcity prevailed during the year, is given by the Inspector-General. The details of such crimes in the Districts of Mozufferpore, Chumparun and Durbhanga, in which the pressure of the scarcity was the greatest, still further bear out the view. These details show that true cases of burglary and theft nearly doubled in these districts in 1889 as against the previous year.

The prevalence of high prices led naturally to increased expenditure on account of prison diet and hospitals. In regard to the latter item, another cause which has contributed to the increase is stated to be the more liberal scale of diet now allowed to sick prisoners.

The recommendations of the Jail Committee for increasing the sleeping space for each prisoner have chiefly affected the central jails, in which there has been a reduction of nearly 4 per cent. of prisoners in the year. The district and intermediate jails generally had sufficient accommodation to meet the requirements of health, but it was otherwise with the central jails. The recommendation of Dr. Lethbridge to reconvert some of the intermediate jails into district jails, awaits the consideration of the Government, which is likely to deal with the question on a large scale after the effects of the scarcity on the number of the jail population have passed away.

There is a slight decrease in the number of releases of convicts on appeal, but this is not accepted as an indication of improved judicial administration. On this subject, the Lieutenant-Governor observes: "There had been a steady increase in the number of such releases since 1882, and the slight decrease of last year, although it occurred in a year of numerous admissions, does not show any marked improvement in what is an unsatisfactory feature in the criminal administration of Bengal."

The number of convicts transported increased from 797 in 1887 and 803 in 1888 to 829 in 1889. These statistics are for the whole country. The numbers for Bengal are 97 and 119 for the last two years. The steady increase is the effect of orders relaxing the rules which formerly regulated the selection of convicts for deportation. In the number of executions there was an unusual decrease from 21 in 1888 to 17 in the year under review.

The jail administration is to be congratulated on its improved control of Burman convicts. Their conduct is pronounced to have been on the whole good. The Government, however, inculcates caution in treating them and discourages overmuch of confidence in them. "The Burmese," says the Government Resolution, "are a dangerous class of prisoners on account of their instability of character, their impulsive nature, and their great impatience of restraint, but their capacity for work is superior to that of other native convicts, and the Superintendents are naturally inclined to appoint them freely to jail offices. It is not, however, safe to have a large proportion of these men as overseers and convict warders, for even holding offices of trust is not sufficient to restrain their longing for freedom. The Jail Committee have therefore proposed the introduction of a ticket-of-leave system for them, a measure which has been advocated by this Government for the last three years. The question is now under the consideration of the Government of India."

The proportions of criminals in regard to race and religion remain almost unaltered. During the year 1890, they were about 61 per cent. Hindus, 35 per cent. Mahomedans, 1.24 per cent. Christians, 0.36 per cent. Buddhists and Jains, and nearly 3 per cent. of all other religions. The number of juveniles admitted in 1889 was 434 against 306 in the preceding year—a rather large increase. Both the Reformatory schools at Alipore and Hazaribagh are said to be doing excellent work. The number of female convicts also shows an increase from 1218 to 1280. 87 per cent. of prisoners admitted during the year were unable to read and write, 9.48 were able to read and write a little, and 3.48 to read and write well.

There is an increase of sentences to simple imprisonment for which an explanation is necessary. This was particularly the case in the four districts of Singbhum, Manbhum, Puri and Patna, and the Government has directed that the matter should be enquired into. The Government in noticing a slight decrease in the number of re-convicted prisoners, observes: "The recent rules regarding the identification and classification of habitual offenders have been worked with great care both by the Jail and Police Departments; still the Lieutenant-Governor thinks that much more remains to be done." The punishment of habitual criminals is not often sufficiently deterrent. The Inspector-General says that there are in the central jails 300 or 400 incorrigible thieves for whom transportation for life is the only effective punishment. Experiments in the system of anthropometry on the model of jail administration in Paris have been recommended for the sanction of the Government of India. The number of persons imprisoned for failing to give security for good behaviour had been somewhat rapidly increasing since 1884, but the last year shows a slight falling off.

Strict discipline continues to be enforced among the jail guards, and their improved appearance and efficiency have been noticed by the Government with satisfaction. The discipline among the prisoners has also improved.

The death-rate shows no improvement. Overcrowding was the cause of unhealthiness in some of the jails, but this defect is being gradually remedied. The chief cause, however, of the present rate of mortality is stated to be the fact that the health of the prisoners of the year under report was greatly affected by the general poorness of the crops in many parts of the province. The principal diseases were cerebro-spinal fever and cholera. The first proved very deadly and the Lieutenant-Governor has directed a special enquiry into the matter. As a set off, as it were, there is a bright side to the picture. It is satisfactory to learn from a statement given in the jail report that there were considerable numbers who left the jail in better health than they entered.

THE REIS & RAYYET DEFAMATION CASE.

THE local event of the week is a drama of which we are the unenvied and unfortunate hero. The phenomenon is—Reis & Rayyet in court! Ordinarily, this would be nothing particular. To be rightly or wrongly charged with libels is the inevitable fate of public writers—a common incident of journalism. But there are circumstances, of an accidental character perhaps, in this case which separate it from its everyday fellows. One of these peculiarities may be mentioned. This journal is in its ninth year, and though anything but a mealy-mouthed organ, the charge of defamation undergoing investigation in the Police Court is the first case, either of a criminal or civil nature, which has ever been brought against it. The editor has been dabbling in printer's ink from before the Mutinies, having edited a Calcutta European daily for several weeks at the beginning of 1856 and afterwards joined as contributor to the defunct Hindu Intelligencer when he was a student at College, and published a pamphlet on the events of 1857 towards the end of that year in London. In this long career of an outspoken publicist of thirty-five years, during which he has, wittingly or unwittingly, touched the corns of no end of persons, high and low, he had never received a process of court on account of anything ever written or published by him until he was called to appear in the Police this week. This call at the fag end of his life on an old journalist—old sinner caught at last if you will—invests the case with a peculiar interest in the eyes of all such as have watched him for any length of time. The other peculiarities we are not permitted to touch. For one thing, the case is sub judice, and that itself, for all men brought up in English principles, is sufficient reason for reticence. Although we have always combatted this among other notions, legal, political, moral, social, and literary, which we in our humble sincerity regard as noxious popular or class prejudices or errors, we must respect it ourself in our own case. Besides, we have no wish to say aught which may be construed into prejudicing the cause of the prosecutors, as we would avoid prejudicing our own.

It is no doubt a task at once difficult and delicate to reconcile our professional duty with the obedience we all owe to the law and the profound respect we always feel for Her Majesty's administrators of justice. We shall try to perform it as best we can. For, whatever may be the case with other papers, in this connection, it is obviously expected of us that we should not content ourselves with giving the Police report like our contemporaries. Some explanation, seems urgently due from us to the public.

On the 17th May last, in the usual course of business, we noticed in a subleader headed "Disease, Accident and Death" the deaths which had recently occurred in native society of its more prominent members. In that article we gave, upon such information as we possessed, an estimate of an important member of the Hindu community, Baboo Deno Nath Mallik, (one of those just deceased,) who had not, in our judgment, presented to his countrymen, either as a public or a private man, such an example as from his great position he might and should have done, concluding with the best wishes for his sons, whom we wished to make a departure from the parental model. Immediately after the appearance of the article we were told that, as we wished and anticipated, it had been thankfully received by the family. A few days thence, however, we were startled by the news that efforts were being made to proceed against this paper in the Courts. In our next impression, that of the 24th May, in criticising some of the notices of the deceased in a different vein, in some of the other journals of the metropolis, we reiterated our view and alluded to those efforts. We treated the matter cavalierly, because of the feeling already mentioned in the family and the general opinion in town. Doubt was removed when, in the following month, we received a letter from Babu Ganes Chunder Chunder, as attorney for Babus Jogendra Nath Mallik and Jogendra Nath Mallik, sons of the late Babu Denonath Mallik, expostulating on their part with us for the articles of the 17th and 24th May as containing "imputations of the grossest kind on the character and position of my client's father recently deceased, and having naturally caused them the deepest pain and annoyance" and, after complaining of the publication in the terms of the law, calling upon us for full retraction and ample apology, on pain of being proceeded against in court. Friends on both sides now intervened and led us to expect that the matter would not be pushed to extremity but be amicably settled. But as, in the dilatory ways of our people, nothing definite was done, we, in our issue of the 14th June, prominently, under the head of Notice to Correspondents, acknowledged receipt and intimated to our correspondent that his letter was "under consideration." Our correspondent did not wait, however. In three or four days came the great Hindu festival of the Rath Jatra of Jagannath or the Lord of the World's Ride in his tower-chariot. On that auspicious day, on which Hindus delight to begin any interesting ceremony or arduous operation, he hurried to the Police Court, applied before Mr. Handley, the Chief Presidency Magistrate, and obtained summonses against the Printer and the Editor of Reis and Rayyet respectively, and had them served—that on the Editor as he was waiting for the appearance in all his glory of the Lord of the World. Under the circumstance, our "consideration" remained locked up in our breast, though even now we have an article in proof never published headed "Babu Deno Nath Mallik once more." Pursuant to summons, we appeared as defendant in the Police Court on last Thursday. In whatever light the pleader's art might represent us, we can honestly say that we had no intention whatever of hurting the feelings of Babu Deno Nath Mallik's sons, and, strange though it may seem, the thought never struck us that what we wrote might be construed to be an offence against them. Seeing that we had unwittingly done so, we at once through the mouth of our counsel expressed our sincere regret. The editor having assumed all the responsibility of our action, the prosecution did not press the case against the printer, but they insisted on the editor pleading guilty. This was not done.

Then after some formal evidence for the prosecution was recorded, the case was adjourned to next week.

We wrote, as we believed and still believe, in the interests of the public. Ours is an old society and we conceive it to be the duty of every man who claims to be a leading member of it to do all he can to conserve the best that there is in it. Babu Deno Nath Mallik certainly was a leading member of our society, and we wrote of him as we did as a matter of duty, without personal bias of any sort and, as we have said, without intending to hurt the feelings of any one, much less his sons. We see they have taken offence at what we wrote, and once more disclaiming any intention of giving offence, we thus publicly apologise to them.

THE TIPPERAH RAJ.

SIR,—Your leaderette which appeared in the "Reis and Rayyet" of 31st May on the appointment of Rai Bahadur Umakant Das as minister to the Raj, reveals an amount of statesmanship and political foresight which none sees better than do the Tipperah men. It is a pity that you do not deal with the causes of the Maharaja's debts and embarrassments.

From the extracts published in the "Englishman" in the year 1885 or so from the diary of an Englishman, apparently Mr. Skrine, it appeared that he attributed all, if I remember aright, to the "eye-shame" of the Maharaja and the evil counsels and machinations of the Dacca men whom he styled "the Scotchmen of the East." That the Maharaja is not above "eye-shame," is quite true. He does not and cannot say "no" to any prayer. With rare goodness His Highness believes all his servants, rather too much; and among them some happen to be more confidential than others with whom the real power rests; and they in their turn have an interest in the disorder of the state. Being full of the milk of human kindness, he will not starve the family of a corrupt officer by dismissal, or otherwise punish him. It is widely known that had His Highness been surrounded by men of virtue, ability and wisdom, they, by utilising his virtues, instead of lending themselves to his failings, could perform achievements to the lasting glory of the Maharaja and themselves over and above raising the Raj to a model state.

Now I intend to return to Mr. Skrine's "Scotchmen of the East." I feel bound to say that our Dacca brethren have not deserved this epithet. Notwithstanding, it is certain that the natives of Tipperah have more interest in the welfare of the state than men of any other district who may come to serve the Maharaja for money and scarcely for love. There is not a man in Tipperah, whether Independent or British, who has not or whose forefathers have not eaten the Maharaja's salt. The distinction "Independent Maharaja" is a subject of pride and glory to them. They, an overwhelming majority of them at least, look with reverential awe and veneration upon this prince, inasmuch as there is great religious merit in beholding a real Hindu Prince---Rajdarsan. Besides, both talukdars and rayyets know that they are no units in a soulless body politic, but are under a prince who is affectionate as a father. They can and do, during any misfortune, obtain pardon of a year or two's rent or at least permission to keep the rent in arrear. Not only that, the Maharaja usually makes liberal grants during marriages or sadhis or other important ceremonies to his people. The whole district is supplied with timber, burning fuel, bamboos, rattans, thatching stuff, cotton and other necessities of life for a nominal price. The Gods and Brahmans of the Hindoos are supported by the Maharaja. Yet the natives of Tipperah are being successfully eliminated from the Maharaja's service. Among the many high officials only two belong to this district. They however have no power in the central administration of the state. The Bhadra of this district generally belong to the landed interest or are otherwise substantial men; and any loss that they may occasion to the state can be easily recovered, but not so in the case of the Dacca men. Out of 57 officers in the Chakla Kacheri, or the head office of the Zemindary of Roushunabad, at Comillah, only 15 belong to this district; and in the moffusil under the jurisdiction of Chakla Kacheri out of 60 posts 24 fall to the Tipperah men. Those of the officers that belong to this district only fill the rank and file.

In the leaderette you say "A minister supported by the British Government and carrying the prestige of one who has long held the office of Assistant Political Agent at the court is not only a guarantee for reform but the only resource against bankruptcy and dismemberment---maybe the only safety for the old principality." For all that the Rai Bahadur will not find it smooth sailing all over. Already in his attempt against the favourites, he has not been able to achieve any appreciable success. He will have to show much pluck and courage in his fight with them; and if he has the welfare of the old principality at heart, as I am sure he has, he should take no rest until the territory of the Maharaja is cleared of their presence. He should take good care that neither they nor their friends have access to His Highness. Favourites have since the creation proved themselves of the Devil's crew. How many kings, lords and wealthy men have they ruined! How the favourites of the Maharaja ruined the late lamented Babu Nilmony Das who did right yeoman's service to the Maharaja's state! His Highness wept over his death only too late. Nor was the Roman hand of the statesman who succeeded him permitted to touch them. Then the eyes of the people and the selection of their Maharaja fell upon the excellent and intelligent Thakur Sahab Dhananjay, blessed with a hereditary capacity for administration.

He, after deliberate and mature consideration and consultation with men of known ability and integrity, submitted a Budget which provided for retrenchment and economy and a scheme calculated to increase the revenue of the state as well as to purge it of the favourites. In due course of time, His Highness asked the opinion of his favourites upon the Budget; and the Maharaja was of course convinced that Dananjay Thakur Sahab---the brightest jewel of a nobleman at the court---was only a green youth---although he was wellknown to have for many years successfully administered the entire Southern half of the principality. Indeed, his successor, Baboo Dino Nath Sen, M. A., Joint-Inspector of Schools, spoke of his predecessor's Budget as incapable of any improvement. But he too having failed to get it passed was glad to hurry off to rejoin his own post in the British Service. He was succeeded by Babu Mohini Mohun Bardhan, B. L., Government Pleader, Comillah. After pinching the favourites, it was reserved for this weak and vacillating minister to be won over to their side. He quarrelled with his old friends and after their support was gone he was easily insulted and forced to resign. These favourites in fact enjoy a monopoly of real power in the state without appearing to have anything like it, for the arch favourites hold no responsible position. In every good and important undertaking the ostensible minister is hampered by these favourites who are the virtual ministers. For the doings of the latter the former is responsible. When these favourites think of ruining any high official, their preliminary step is to close to him all the avenues of access to the Maharaja. Letters to His Highness are carefully intercepted in the way. Had the Maharaja known that his favourites are his enemies, he would certainly pray

"Ye sacred powers, whose gracious providence

Is watchful for our good, guard me from men

From their deceitful tongues, their vows, and flatteries."

But the Maharaja cannot perceive all this. Verily, these hangers-on live a charmed life! In a land of mysteries and miracles where every Tipperah or Kuki is believed by himself and ignorant Bengalees to possess the secret wherewith to hold captive the wildest of tigers and perform other wonders, a handful of parasites is ruining the state. Who will rescue the Maharaja out of their hands?

Tipperah, June 25, 1890.

THE REIS AND RAYYET DEFAMATION CASE.

THE POLICE COURT.—JUNE 26.

(Before A. P. Handley, Esq., Offg. Chief Presidency Magistrate.)

This case had a near chance of being struck off the boards yesterday (June 26). When called on before the Chief Presidency Magistrate neither of the prosecutors was in court, and his worship was on the point of dismissing it in consequence of the default, when one of them put in an appearance and asked for a short postponement to admit of his counsel, who was engaged in another court, attending. The request was granted, and the case put back until 11 o'clock. When taken up at that hour, Messrs. Garth and Woodroffe, junior, instructed by Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, appeared for the prosecution, and Messrs. Henderson and A. F. Abdur Rahman, instructed by Baboo N. C. Bose, and Baboo Kanyelal Mookerjee, Pleader, represented the defendants. Before the facts of the case were enquired into, Mr. Henderson represented to the magistrate that his client, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, was in indifferent health, and he begged that as a special concession he might be allowed a seat alongside of his counsel instead of being compelled to go into the dock. This having been agreed to, Mr. Henderson again rose and addressed the magistrate. He said that to save the time of the court he would state at once that Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee admitted the responsibility of the articles complained of, and expressed his sincere regret for the pain their publication has caused the relatives of the deceased gentleman to whom the obituary notices had referred. He had no idea that the notices would have caused the pain they were said to have produced. Efforts had been made to compromise the case, and now that his client had publicly expressed regret for his error of judgment, he hoped the magistrate would consent to the withdrawal of the charge against his client. He was instructed that the prosecution would offer no objection to a compromise.

Mr. Garth wished to know if, by expressing regret, Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee pleaded guilty. Unless that was done, he (Mr. Garth) could say nothing more at present; if there was no plea of guilty, he would have to go on with the case. He desired it to be thoroughly understood that his clients were prepared to prove their case. He did not press the case against the printer, but Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee must plead guilty to having published the libel before he, Mr. Garth, would say anything further on the matter.

Mr. Henderson said that if the prosecution were not prepared to accept the apology tendered and the expression of regret for the publication, his client would plead not guilty.

Mr. Garth desired to say that, by accepting this apology and expression of regret without the plea of guilty, the effect would be that it would be thought the case had been compromised. There was no suggestion of a compromise, and he therefore suggested that there should be a plea of guilty recorded. There had been an expression of regret tendered, which was as much as pleading guilty.

His Worship did not see how there could be an expression of regret unless the person was guilty.

Mr. Henderson submitted it did not amount to that.

Mr. Garth said it must be remembered that his client, through Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, had called upon the defendant, by a letter, dated 6th of June, for an apology, but none was tendered. On the contrary, in the current number of the paper, Reis and Rayyet, there appeared a most insulting paragraph in answer as notice to correspondents:—"Gonesh Chunder Chunder.---Under consideration." This was simply a gross aggravation of the offence. If the defence were not aware that the articles would cause pain, as stated by their counsel, and now expressed regret, why was it not done when they were called upon by letter, unless they thought the complainants were devoid of all feeling? They were asked for a public apology to be tendered in a public way, so that the public would understand that the family did wish to vindicate their father's character. If, on receipt of the letter from Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, they for the first time became aware that pain had been caused, why did they not apologise and express regret in the next issue? Instead of this, there was a grossly insulting and impertinent paragraph in the notice to correspondents (in issue of 14th June), which only aggravated the offence.

After some consultation with his client and attorney, Mr. Henderson said that the course he would propose to take was that he would, on behalf of his client, consent to the papers in which the articles appeared being put in, and would admit responsibility. He would ask for an adjournment in order to consider what course to adopt. He wished to place no obstacles in the way of the prosecution, or put them to any expense, and there was the statement of his client admitting responsibility of the articles.

His Worship thought there must be a plea, and he could only grant an adjournment by consent of the prosecution.

Mr. Garth said he was very willing that the defence should have reasonable time to consider whether there would be a plea of guilty or whether the case was to be proceeded with, but the time should not go over to-day. All the witnesses were present, and his client did not wish to be put to more expense than was necessary.

His Worship observed that the defendants had already had a week to think over what they were going to do.

Mr. Garth suggested that the defence should have half an hour or an hour the most to consider what course they would adopt.

Mr. Henderson submitted that was not enough, and asked for at least another day.

His Worship decided that he could not do so unless the other side consented. The defence had a week to consider the matter, so that it was not a thing which had been suddenly sprung on them. They must have known that they would either have to fight the case out or plead guilty.

Mr. Henderson said his client admitted responsibility and publication of the articles, and would consent to the issues in which those articles appeared being put in, so as to save the prosecution any expense; and then an adjournment might be granted to some other day in order to consider whether the case would be proceeded with or a plea of guilty recorded with the expression of regret.

His Worship observed that if the case was proceeded with, he would send the case to the Sessions, and would therefore have to take the depositions on Sessions paper. There was not only one article, and publication would have to be proved in the regular way.

After some consultation between counsel, Mr. Garth proceeded to prove publication, and the following witnesses were then examined:--

The information of Chooney Lal Dutt:--I live at No. 18, Ockoor Dutt's Lane. No. 1 forms part of No. 18. My uncle, my cousins, and myself all live here. I know Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee. He edits Reis and Rayyet, at No. 1. The press is also at No. 1. Mutty Lal Bose is the printer of the paper Reis and Rayyet. I see them here. They are the defendants. The office of the paper is at No. 1. These are issues of Reis and Rayyet dated 17th and 24th May and 14th June. These copies were issued from No. 1.

Mr. Henderson produced the letter of the 6th June from Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, which was tendered by Mr. Garth, and marked as an exhibit.

The information of Nogendro Nath Mullick:--I am one of the complainants in this case, and the eldest son of Deno Nath Mullick, deceased--that is, the Deno Nath Mullick referred to in the articles in Reis and Rayyet. The accusations made against my father in that paper are false. They have caused pain and annoyance to me and the rest of the family. They are such as to lower my family and myself in the estimation of the Hindoo community.

Mr. Henderson said he would reserve cross-examination in the event of the case being proceeded with.

Mr. Garth submitted that his Worship should now frame a charge.

His Worship observed that it would take a considerable time to frame the charge, which was practically drawn in the summons. The charge would, of course, be under Section 501.

After this, on the application of Mr. Henderson, the case was by consent adjourned till Wednesday next at 11-30 A.M.---The morning papers.

TRANSFER RULES FOR HIGH SCHOOLS.

I.---A student, before he is admitted to a high school, shall be required to produce a transfer certificate from the head-master of the school (of whatever class) in which he has last been reading. He should be accompanied by, or should present a letter of application from, his father or bonâ fide guardian, whose name should be registered in the admission book of the school. His father's name and place of residence should invariably be registered, in order to secure identification. If he has failed at the previous Entrance examination, and applies for admission in the following session without having joined any other school, the Registrar's receipt shall be accepted in lieu of a certificate. The fact of his admission, with the date, should be written across the face of the Registrar's receipt.

II.---The certificate shall run as follows:--

"Certified that _____, son of _____, an inhabitant of _____ was in the _____ class of the _____ school up to _____, and left with a _____ character. All sums due by him to the school have been paid. He has (or has not) passed the annual examination for promotion to the _____ class. His age on leaving is believed to have been _____ years _____ months."

Dated _____

Head Master.

III.---Application for the transfer of a student must be made by his parent or bonâ fide guardian, either personally or by letter (registered, if necessary), to the head-master of the school which he is leaving; and when so made the certificate is to be given without any avoidable delay. The only grounds on which it can be refused are (1) gross misconduct, (2) failure to pay the sums due to the school, including schooling fees and fines and transfer fee (if any). If a certificate is refused, the cause of refusal shall be notified in writing to the applicant. If the certificate is not received within three days of the payment by the student of the amount (if any) due to the school, the matter may be referred to the Inspector of Schools, or to the Director of Public Instruction, as laid down in Rule XII.

IV.---Any instance of "gross misconduct" on the part of a student, whether followed or not by expulsion, must be at once reported to the Department, failing which no future action can be taken on it. A student expelled for misconduct cannot be admitted to another school without the express sanction of the Department.

V.---For the purposes of the transfer certificate, the date on which a student presents his application for transfer, or the date of the receipt of the letter (Rule III), shall be regarded as the date upon which his connection with the school ceased; and no fee shall be charged to him for any subsequent month. But if the student does not pay the sums due from him to the school within three days of his receiving intimation of their amount, he shall be treated as "absent without notice" until such sums are paid, subject (as regards any further sums so accruing) to the limit stated in Rule VI.

VI.---A student quitting a school without notice shall be liable to pay fees, together with fines for absence, for one month subsequent to that in which he last attended the school, after which his connection with the school shall be considered to have ceased.

VII.---A student quitting a school, except at the close of a session, shall be liable to pay a transfer fee before obtaining his transfer certificate. The transfer fee shall not (except under special orders of the Department in the case of free schools) exceed the ordinary monthly fee of the class.

VIII.---The session of each school ends in the month in which the annual examinations for promotion are held, and preceeding that in which the new classes are formed. For students sent up to the Entrance examination, the session ends in May.

IX.---If a student withdraws from a school after the Durga Puja vacation, he shall be liable to pay fees in that school up to the end of the session.

X.---A student shall not be sent up to the Entrance examination until he has paid all sums due to the institution in which he has been reading, including fees up to the end of the session in May.

XI.---When a student of the first or second class has held a scholarship, free studentship, or half-pay studentship, under express stipulation in writing, signed by himself and his guardian, that the whole or a portion of the sum drawn by or remitted to him shall be refunded to the school in case of withdrawal from it within a certain period, the transfer certificate may be withheld until the sums so due have been repaid, provided that the amount so claimed shall not exceed the amount actually drawn or remitted.

XII.—The transfer of Government scholarship-holders and free students shall be subject to the previous sanction of the Inspector or Joint Inspector of Schools, or (in the case of schools attached to first-grade colleges) of the Director of Public Instruction, which will be withheld unless satisfactory reasons are assigned for the transfer.

XIII.—A student shall not, on admission to a school, be placed in a class higher than that in which he was in the school he has quitted, or if he has passed the annual examination for promotion, than the next higher class. This rule shall apply to admissions to the three highest classes. Thus, a student failing at the annual examination of the fourth class of one school cannot be admitted to the third class of another.

XIV.—If a student has been absent from a school for a full year, and if the Inspector of Schools or the Director of Public Instruction (vide Rule XII) is satisfied that his absence was not due to misconduct or rustication, the preceding rule may, with the sanction of the Inspector or the Director, as the case may be, be relaxed in his favour.

XV.—The fact of a student applying for admission without having undergone the annual examination of his old school must be regarded, unless the reverse is certified to by his former headmaster, as sufficient evidence of his not having been fit for promotion. He should not therefore be admitted into a class higher than that in which he was in the other school.

XVI.—After admission under the foregoing rules, no student shall be promoted to a higher class before the next annual examination of the school. The application of this and the preceding rule shall be confined to the three highest classes. (See illustration, Rule XIII.)

Note (1).—It would be a violation of this rule to send up a student to the Entrance examination before he has been promoted in due course to the first class of the school.

Note (2).—The annual examinations are held at various times from December to February. In the case of a student admitted under Rule XV, the "next annual examination" means the annual examination held in the following session.

Note (3).—The annual examination will not be recognised in any school which has not been bond fide in existence from the beginning of the session.

XVII.—The provisional admission of a student to a school will not be recognised. No student will be regarded as belonging to a school unless and until his name is entered both in the admission book and on the register of a certain class.

XVIII.—A student who has failed at the test examination of his school shall not be sent up to the Entrance examination as a student of any other school, nor shall he be sent up to that examination as a private student.

XIX.—All questions arising between one head-master and another respecting the enforcement of these rules shall be referred, as soon as possible, to the Inspector or the Director (vide Rule XII).

XX.—If a student be found producing a false document or making a false statement as to his attendance at any school, he shall be liable to expulsion, and shall be reported to the Department.

XXI.—Willful transgression or colourable evasion of any of the foregoing rules will render a school liable to forfeit the right of sending up candidates for junior scholarships, and to be reported to the University for further penalties.

THE NIMTOLLAH BURNING GHAT.

This is the chief place in Calcutta for the disposal of the Hindoo dead. This Burning Ghat, as it is popularly called, is not exactly the old site, but it is, as it must be and has always been, immediately on the river. The town having steadily encroached on the Hooghly, the ghat has many a time shifted its situation. The present structure is the construction of the Port Commissioners, who have at no small cost improved the river bank.

The Hindoos do not bury but burn their dead. It is undoubtedly a quick and sanitary process. The horror hitherto attached to cremation is decidedly dying out. Modern civilization has fairly begun to look kindly on it. The practice is slowly but surely gaining on Christian Europe. It is about to be tried in Manchester. The only place in England where as yet the plan of burning the bodies of the dead has been substituted for that of allowing them to slowly moulder—and fester away into ashes, under five feet of earth, or much less—is Woking Cemetery, near London, although many great cities on the Continent have for some years practised the system on rather a large scale. The experiment at Woking has been satisfactory, although it has had to contend with a great deal of hostile prejudice; and on April 25th the Manchester Cremation Society resolved upon the formation of a company to establish and carry on a crematorium in the neighbourhood of that city. The names on the directorate include that of the Duke of Westminster.

The old ghat could scarcely be approached. The Hindoos bitterly complained of the inconveniences experienced by them in the performance of their sad duty at the ghat. But those days are gone by and the present ghat has ceased to be the dreadful place associated in the Hindoo mind with sabam. In 1856, we find the Municipal Commissioners for the Improvement of the Town of Calcutta, reporting to Government as follows:—

"In para. 56 of our last Annual Report, we alluded to the contemplated improvement of the Hindoo Burning Ghat at Nimtollah, and the removal of the Skinning Ghat altogether from its present locality, which being in close contact with the Burning Ghat, leads to a most offensive and objectionable collection of birds of prey, and of odour from the carcasses of the animals, which are daily deposited there, to the number on an average of about one hundred, and thereby a serious objection to the respectable Hindoo community, whose religious customs compel them to resort to the place. A plan and estimate were drawn up by our Surveyor for the improvement and ornament of the site, with additional conveniences for the sick and their attendants, which was circulated by the Native Members of the Board amongst their friends; and we have now the satisfaction of stating that, through the munificence of Baboo Ram Narain Dutt, of Wellington Square, one-half the entire cost, which is estimated at Rs. 5,000, has been promised to be defrayed by himself; in consideration thereof, and with a view to promote a great improvement, which when effected, will, we have no doubt, be highly appreciated by the native community, we have decided to defray the remaining portion of the expense from the Conservancy Funds, and we further are directing our endeavours to make the improvement complete by removing the Skinning Ghat altogether away to a locality quite out of the precincts of the Town, and where its disgusting presence will be productive of no inconvenience to the public, as is now the case. We have received repeated complaints of the nuisance now arising from these places, but up to this time have been unable to make permanent arrangements for their removal."

The Skinning Ground has long been removed far away from the city. It is not to be denied that the Burning Ghat by itself cannot but be somewhat of a nuisance in the midst of a populous and busy city. During the sixties, there was a movement to make the Burning Ghat follow the Skinning Ground. There was a great Hindoo outcry. The Hindoo corpse is sacred. None but relatives and caste-men are permitted to touch it. Hindoo feeling prescribes the carrying of the dead on the shoulders of kith and kin. Hindoo scripture, at any rate, permits no other conveyance of the dead than that on the shoulders of fellow Hindoos. The Hindoos scouted the idea of sending the remains of their near and dear ones as goods by railway or any other impersonal agency to a distant Burning Ground. The agitation was echoed by the Press at home. Among others, the Spectator, conducted by a former distinguished Anglo-Indian editor, strongly supported the Hindoo movement. The late Ramgopal Ghose surpassed himself by a wonderful strain of pathetic oratory against the proposition for the removal of the Ghat. By the effort of one brief hour the man, who from his life and conversation in disregard of Hindoo orthodoxy, was regarded as the impersonation of the Iron Age, became the idol of the people, and though dead for many years, is still regarded with affectionate gratitude. The end of it all was that the Hindoos escaped the contemplated outrage. Not only did the Commissioners vote with Ramgopal, but the Government, at whose instance the innovation was proposed, abandoned the idea. The Nimtollah Burning Ghat was saved, and it was made the decent place that it is shewn to be in our illustration.

The process of cremation is cheap and simple. A pyre of wood is erected. The corpse is washed and robed in new clothes, a few mantras are uttered by the son or the nearest relative, the corpse is then laid on the pyre and fire applied to it, when it is reduced to ashes in two or three hours. The whole, ordinarily, costs only Rs. 3-7 for adults, and Re. 1-11-8 for minors under 10 years, according to the tariff fixed by the Municipal Commissioners. Paupers are burnt at the other Ghat—adults for Re. 1-8, and minors for annas 13-6 only—and absolute paupers for nothing, the charge being borne by the Municipality.

In former days, a sore grievance of the poorer part of the population in especial was the tyranny of the firewood vendors. In the absence of a fixed tariff, they stuck out for absurd prices, and kept up an indecent wrangle which not unoften degenerated into a row, while the corpse was suffered to lie neglected and decomposing under a tropical sun. The complaints were so many and numerous that some of the Native Justices of the day were induced to arrange for a definite price. The negotiations ended in a monopoly. We find the last Municipal Act of 1881 as also the present (1889) empowering the Commissioners to grant licenses for the sale at the Burning Grounds of the articles used for cremating corpses, and to prescribe a rate for the sale of such articles. Under the law, the Municipal Commissioners have the full control of the Burning Ghats, but they are not competent to close one unless another is available within a convenient distance. Both Lord Dufferin and Lord Lansdowne have visited the Nimtollah Burning Ghat.—The Empress, June 1.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the five belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News, October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE MASSACRE OF GLENCOE.

Do not lift him from the bracken,
Leave him lying where he fell—
Better bier ye cannot fashion :
None beseems him half so well,
As the bare and broken heather,
And the hard and trampled sod,
Whence his angry soul ascended
To the judgment-seat of God !
Winding-sheet we cannot give him—
Seek no mantle for the dead,
Save the cold and spotless covering,
Showered from heaven upon his head.
Leave his broadsword, as we found it,
Bent and broken with the blow,
That, before he died, avenged him
On the foremost of the foe.
Leave the blood upon his bosom—
Wash not off that sacred stain
Let it stiffen on the tartan,
Let his wounds unclosed remain,
Till the day when he shall show them
At the throne of God on high,
When the murderer and the murdered
Meet before their Judge's eye !

Nay—ye should not weep, my children !
Leave it to the faint and weak ;
Sobs are but a woman's weapon—
Tears befit a maiden's cheek.
Weep not, children of Macdonald !
Weep not thou, his orphan heir—
Not in shame, but saintless honor,
Lies thy slaughtered father there.
Weep not—but when years are over,
And thine arm is strong and sure,
And thy foot is swift and steady
On the mountain and the muir—
Let thy heart be hard as iron,
And thy wrath as fierce as fire,
Till the hour when vengeance cometh
For the race that slew thy sire !
Till in deep and dark Glenlyon
Rise a louder shriek of woe,
Than at midnight, from their eyrie,
Scared the eagles of Glencoe.
Louder than the screams that mingled
With the howling of the blast,
When the murderer's steel was clashing,
And the fires were rising fast.

When thy noble father bounded
To the rescue of his men,
And the slogan of our kindred
Pealed throughout the startled glen.
When the herd of frantic women
Stumbled through the midnight snow,
With their fathers' houses blazing,
And their dearest dead below !
Oh, the horror of the tempest,
As the flashing drift was blown,
Crimsoned with the conflagration,
And the roofs went thundering down !
Oh, the prayers—the prayers and curses
That together winged their flight
From the maddened hearts of many
Through that long and woful night !
Till the fires began to dwindle,
And the shots grew faint and few,
And we heard the foeman's challenge,
Only in a far halloo.
Till the silence once more settled
O'er the gorges of the glen,
Broken only by the Cona
Plunging through its naked den.
Slowly from the mountain summit
Was the drifting veil withdrawn,
And the ghastly valley glimmered
In the gray December dawn.
Better had the morning never
Dawned upon our dark despair !
Black amidst the common whiteness
Rose the spectral ruins there ;
But the sight of these was nothing,
More than wrings the wild dove's breast,
When she searches for her offspring
Round the relics of her nest.
For, in many a spot, the tartan
Peered above the wintry heap,
Marking where a dead Macdonald
Lay within his frozen sleep.
Tremblingly we scooped the covering
From each kindred victim's head,
And the living lips were burning
On the cold ones of the dead.
And I left them with their dearest
Dearest charge had every one—
Left the maiden with her lover,
Left the mother with her son.
I alone of all was mateless,
Far more wretched I than they,
For the snow would not discover
Where my lord and husband lay.
But I wandered up the valley,
Till I found him lying low,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

With the gash upon his bosom
And the frown upon his brow—
Till I found him lying murdered,
Where he wooed me long ago !

Woman's weakness shall not shame me !
Why should I have tears to shed ?

Could I rain them down like water,
O my hero, on thy head—

Could the cry of lamentation
Wake thee from thy silent sleep,
Could it set thy heart a throbbing,
It were mine to wail and weep !

But I will not waste my sorrow,
Lest the Campbell women say,
That the daughters of Clanranald
Are as weak and frail as they.

I had wept thee, hadst thou fallen,
Like our fathers, on thy shield,
When a host of English foemen
Camped upon a Scottish field—

I had mourned thee, hadst thou perished
With the foremost of his name,

When the valliant and the noble
Died around the dauntless Græme !

But I will not wrong thee, husband,
With my unavailing cries,

Whilst thy cold and mangled body,
Stricken by the traitor, lies :
Whilst he counts the gold and glory

That this hideous night has won,
And his heart is big with triumph
At the murder he has done.

Other eyes than mine shall glisten,
Other hearts be rent in twain,
Ere the heathbells on thy hillock
Wither in the autumn rain.

Then I'll seek thee where thou sleepest,
And I'll veil my weary head,

Praying for a place beside thee,
Dearer than my bridal bed.

And I'll give thee tears, my husband,
If the tears remain to me,

When the widows of the foemen,
Cry the coronach for thee !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LADY LANSDOWNE leaves Bombay on the 18th July.

LORD LANSDOWNE, immediately after her departure, strays into Pangi, seventeen miles beyond Chini, doing the trip by some fifteen marches, in eight days. Hope he'll not be caught by some Tartar chamois-hunting on the Northern slopes of the Himalayas.

It is too early to say when the Viceroy goes on his cold weather tour. It is likely His Excellency tours through Rajputana, starting from Agra about the end of October.

THE Lieutenant-Governor starts on his monsoon tour on the 21st July, arriving at Hooghly on that day, and visiting Burdwan, Krishnagpur, Berhampore, Moorshedabad, Rampore, Beulah, Maldah, Bhagulpore, Monghyr, Bankipore, Arrah, Buxar, Ghazipore, Chupra, Hutwa, Sadowa, Bettiah, Motihari, Mozufferpore, Gya, Durbhunga, Purneah, Rungpore, returning to Darjeeling on the 25th September.

In two months more, Colonel Conway-Gordon, the Director-General of Railways, leaves for England, making over charge to Major Sargeant at Simla. Major Brackenbury relieves Colonel Sargeant in charge of the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway on the 15th instant.

THE Mohunt of Tripati must live out his sentence in jail. Lord Con-nemara does not see why the sentence should be further reduced.

The High Court has already done what could be done in his favor. The petitioners for his release were not well advised in the matter.

DURING the next calendar year 1891, Government will not offer for sale more than 57,000 chests of Bengal opium or more than 4,750 chests in each month. Of these 4,750 chests, not more than 2,500 will consist of Benares and not more than 2,260 of Patna opium. Any reduction in quantity will be notified three months previously.

IT is difficult for our times to realise the awed surprise with which the invention of printing was regarded by the contemporaries of Gutenberg and Faust and even of Caxton. People considered it a black art and believed those in the secret to be the creatures of the Devil. Indeed, we have to this day the phrase devils applied to compositors. The following story to the same purport has lately appeared in Enrope.

"When printing was introduced into Paris, one of the earliest works printed was Euclid's Elements. The workman perceiving that he had to intercalate circles, squares, triangles, etc., into the text, believed that the book treated of sorcery, and was calculated to evoke the Devil, who would carry him off in the midst of his work. The employer insisted, and the printer concluding that his ruin was contemplated, died of fright a few days later."

THE Abbe Desgodins, Vicar Apostolic of Tibet, who has laboured as a missionary for 35 years on the Eastern frontiers of that country, has lately brought to France for publication the manuscript of a dictionary of the Tibetan language in Latin, French, and English.

A LOW Hindu was brought up before the magistrate at Bombay for theft in a dwelling house. Two persons had entered it in the afternoon, of whom one escaped. The other too would have followed suit—at least would not have been touched as a woman, but for the fact of being caught in the act of carrying away two silver drinking cups, belonging to a Bhatia. It was no common being. This intruder performed a miracle. A strange transformation scene now took place. On touch the woman vanished ! and the—man remained !—with all his imperfections and sins on his head. His womanhood was all a pretence—indeed a mere matter of a petticoat. That taken off, he disclosed himself in his native hideousness as a depredator of the vulgar male order. To account for his being found there in female attire, he pretended, and tried to prove that the complainant was in the habit of indecently assaulting him. He was an old offender, however, having only ten days before left jail on completing a sentence of six weeks' rigorous imprisonment. He was again convicted and sentenced to sixteen weeks' hard labour.

THERE was a regular fight in the Esplanade Police Court, Bombay, between two Mahomedans being the complainant and the defendant in a case there. Before the hearing, the latter seeing the former went up to him for amicable settlement. He was repulsed. Thus words rose high and from words they went to blows, till the police in attendance arrested and the magistrae fined them for disorderly behaviour Rs. 2 each.

THEY commemorated the defence of the Lucknow Residency on the 11th June last, at the Holborn Restaurant, after the British fashion, by a dinner which is held annually, to keep up the memory of the bloody mutinies. General C. A. Barwell presided, and there were present 14 members including some who were infants at the time of the siege, besides three of the relieving force. The most noticeable feature of the festive gathering was that, after the usual loyal and special toasts, at the instance of Sir Joseph Fayrer, a warm tribute of praise and gratitude was accorded to the natives of India who were faithful to the English at a time when the temptation to side with the enemy was so strong.

LAST month, 36,095 persons visited the Indian Museum—Europeans 484 male and 163 female ; Natives 27,424 male and 8,024 female ; or an average of 1,640 during the 22 days it was open to the public.

IN the Bombay High Court, one Edalji Jamsbedji Makhania sued Shapurji Adarji Kalfati for Rs. 10,000, being damages for the loss of services of his daughter Kuvarbai. The plaintiff and the defendant with their families lived in the same house, in Cowasjee Patel-street, but on different floors. There grew up an intimacy between the defendant and the plaintiff's daughter aged 21 years who, on account of the illness of the mother, managed her father's household. She eventually left her father, according to the plaint, being enticed away by the defendant. To console himself in his grief, the father instituted the suit, estimating the loss in rupees, and basing his claim on the English principle and precedents. The parties, we find, have settled their claims and differences out of Court.

THE Secretary of State for India has sanctioned the appointment of a Deputy Secretary and the abolition of that of Junior Under-Secretary in the Foreign Department of the Government of India. That came into effect retrospectively from the 17th May last. Accordingly, Mr. Under-Secretary W. J. Cunningham becomes Deputy Secretary but will continue to officiate as Secretary; Mr. H. S. Barnes, Political Agent of the 2nd Class and Officiating Under-Secretary becomes Under-Secretary but continuing to act as Deputy Secretary, Mr. J. A. Crawford, Junior Under-Secretary and Officiating Political Agent of the 2nd Class, goes back as a substantive Political Agent of the same class; and Mr. G. R. Irwin, Political Agent of the 3rd Class and Officiating Junior Under-Secretary, officiates as Under-Secretary.

A BRAHMIN aged about forty had fallen into a public well. A crowd of spectators immediately assembled round the mouth of the well, but only to make a noise. Just now one Narayan Jagannath Datar, a clerk in the Office of the Reporter on the Native Press, was passing that way and, attracted by the concourse, came to enquire what it was all about. He found the poor fellow in the well struggling desperately. Without a word or a moment's hesitation, good Narayan doffed his clothes and jumped into the well. At considerable risk to himself, he tied the body of the Brahmin to a rope and asked the bystanders to take out the man. Here is a hero among the much abused native clerks. We hope the incident will be formally reported by some of our Bombay friends to the Royal Humane Society for its medal. And might not the Government too go out of its even tenour, by way of encouraging courage and manliness among the people, to notice such a brave good Samaritan's deed? It would surely be some compensation for the sneaking worthlessness that is habitually favoured and not rarely even exalted.

A BRAHMO of Barisal went to court to proceed criminally against a strolling company of players. This company, which combines a hippodrome show with dramatic representation, had not only in its advertisements ridiculed the Brahmo community but also gone the length of performing a play misrepresenting and reviling the Brahmo religion itself. Hence the prosecution. But it was not proceeded with, the players apologising, and the Brahmos being not particularly anxious to send them to jail or smash the company—even though they do not consider the latter's profession an innocent one.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

IT is telegraphed from Madrid that the Sagasta ministry has resigned and will be succeeded by a new Conservative Cabinet with Senor Canovas as President.

SIR Frederick Roberts being detained in India, Sir Redvers Buller succeeds Lord Wolseley as Adjutant-General. Mr. Stanhope stated in the House of Commons that Government was unwilling hastily to decide the question of the abolition of the post of Commander-in-Chief of the forces. The War Minister also announced that Government had accepted the proposal of Lord Hartington's Committee to establish a Naval and Military Council to discuss all matters affecting the War and Marine Departments. The Council will be presided over by the Premier and be a Committee of the Cabinet. All departments will be represented. It is further proposed to form a Military Council consisting of Civil and Military officers of the War Office, as also a Council to decide questions relating to promotion.

That will be but a multiplication of wheels within wheels—an aggravation of the present difficulty—a leap from the frying-pan to the fire! The modern political mind seems incapable of going beyond government by public meeting. They implicitly believe there is safety in a crowd. But they forget the evil of a multitude of councillors—even wise councillors. Of all spheres of action, war is the one that least admits of the interference of a number of heads of equal authority working by a majority. Councils upon councils for war administration! Do these great statesmen forget that councils of war never fight? Under the least real pressure of circumstances all these boards would be swept away, and under danger the nation will install a dictator as a necessary measure of safety.

THE House of Commons is in no mood to entertain the complaints of the Maharaja of Cashmere as put forth by Mr. Bradlaugh. The House would not accede to his request for a Select Committee to enquire into the deposition of Maharaja Pertab Singh. The House also declined, by 226 votes against 88, Mr. Bradlaugh's motion for adjournment in order to discuss the Maharaja's removal from the government of his own territory. There was a long debate, in the course of which Sir John Gorst explained that the step was taken in the interests of the people of Cashmere.

THE Ministry have found the need of public support. On the 28th June, they held a monster Conservative and Unionist fiite and demonstration at the Crystal Palace. There were present the Hon'ble E. Stanhope, Lord Knutsford, Mr. Balfour, Mr. Goschen, Lord Halsbury and several members of the House of Commons. There was a mass meeting at the large central hall at which, at the instance of Sir Algernon Borthwick, a resolution of confidence in Government was unanimously passed. Mr. Balfour denied that the Unionist Government had been shaken by the African Treaty, it had rather removed every probability of a difference with a close ally.

It is too late now to condemn for any practical purpose the Anglo-German Convention regarding Africa. It was signed by the representatives of the two Powers on the 1st July. THE Simla session of the Supreme Legislative Council opened on Thursday, the 3rd instant. Three measures were to be brought forward but only two could be taken up. The first was the introduction by the Law Member of a Bill to amend the Indian Evidence Act of 1872, one of the monuments of the misdirected genius of Sir James Fitz James Stephen. In moving to obtain leave for the purpose, Sir Andrew Scoble stated the principal object to be the rectification of sec. 54, so as to render the previous conviction of an accused person irrelevant where the Crown sought to prove previous conviction for the mere object of shewing that the accused is a bad character and therefore likely to have committed the offence charged to him. It has been remarked by Mr. Justice Pigot in Queen-Empress vs. Kartick Chunder Dass, that while the English Legislature shields an accused from prejudice, the Indian Legislature makes express provision for prejudicing him. The Bill will not, however, be passed at Simla; only the preliminary stages will be settled, the final consideration being reserved for the Calcutta meetings. And very properly so. Where is the reason or the rhyme either of legislating for India away from it, in Little Tibet or Chinese Tartary? We wish advantage might be taken on this occasion to purge the Act of all such Gallic innovations on the noble principles of British criminal jurisprudence introduced by the same hand.

The other measure, brought forward by the Home Member, was the Bill to amend the Cattle Trespass Act. It has been decided that the Act of 1871 affords inadequate protection to planters, and that further legislation was necessary to provide against cattle trespassing in planting districts and near towns. It is proposed to give Local Governments the power to increase, in any area where cattle are allowed to stray, the fines leviable for animals unpounded and to extend to other animals the special provision now made in the case of pigs.

The Census Bill, not being ready, could not be introduced.

A POINT of law of interest to the struggling professional classes has just been decided. It has been held by the High Court that the subscribers to the General Family Pension Fund are not a company, association or partnership for the purpose of carrying on business having for its object the acquisition of gain by the association or by individual members, within the meaning of section 4 of the Indian Companies' Act. W. H. Kraal sued J. H. Whympier to ascertain whether the Fund was not registerable under the Indian Companies' Act. It came on as a special case before Messrs Justices Wilson and Pigot, and was argued by Mr. Woodroffe on behalf of the plaintiff and Mr. Evans for the defendant, on the 28th, 29th and 30th May last. Their lordships took time to consider their judgment. It was delivered on Wednesday last, the 2nd July, by Mr. Justice Wilson. The Statesman thus summarises the judgment:—

"The judgment, which dealt very fully with the arguments advanced on both sides, both as regards the cases cited and the law on the subject, said that the matter had come up before their lordships in the form of a special case submitted for the opinion of the Court under section 527 and the other sections of chapter XXXVIII Civil Procedure Code. The first question submitted to the Court, and the only one their lordships proposed to answer, was whether the subscribers to the General Family Pension Fund were a company, association or partnership for the purpose of carrying on business other than that of banking, which had for its object the acquisition of gain by the company, association, partnership, or by the individual members thereof, within the meaning of section 4 of the Indian Companies' Act, 1882? If the Fund came within this description, then undoubtedly it would require to be registered under the Companies' Act; but if it did not, then registration was unnecessary. In order to bring the association within the meaning of the section in question it must, first, be formed for the purpose of carrying on business, and, secondly, it must have for its object the acquisition of gain: the acquisition being either by the association or individual members. It may be assumed the association was formed for the purpose of carrying on business. That being allowed, the real question remained whether its primary object was the acquisition of gain. Among the sources of gain suggested were the forfeiture of all past payments on non-payment of subscriptions regularly, and the accumulation of a large and increasing reserve fund derived from surplus of contribution over expenditure. This accumulation, it was urged, was a decided gain to the association, inasmuch as it was applied towards lessening contributions from members. Their lordships did not think that any of these could be looked upon as sources of gain to the business, which was intended for mutual benefit, and they could not therefore hold that the acquisition of gain was one of the objects of the business of the Association."

THE Principal of the Residency College, Indore, is to be ex-officio Assistant to the Agent to the Governor-General for Central India. Is the amalgamation intended to be an aid to the education of the princely students? Are they to be initiated into the mysteries of diplomacy? Is it to give the Principal jurisdiction in certain possible contingencies? Or, is it to lend the pedagogue the prestige of the caste political? Even on the lowest ground, as adding dignity and weight to the authority of the Principal, we regard this a move in the right direction. For the same reason, we think it was highly proper to reward the services of the head of the Education of Bengal with a Knighthood. It was a visible recognition of the importance of the department, and a public expression of the interest of Government in the cause of national instruction.

THE Deccan Times of the 26th June opens with a short leading article headed "The Police and Zenanas," in which the Calcutta case of trespass and breaking into the Zenana brought some time ago against a European Inspector and a native sergeant of Police by one Nobodeep Chunder Ghose is noticed. We need not give the particulars which must be fresh in the mind of the reader. The officiating Chief Magistrate dismissed the complaint, with the following expression of opinion:—

"Although I hold that a police officer can enter a Zenana in charge of an offender, I hope it will be understood that I do not approve of such a course. In a country like India, where Zenanas are regarded as sacred, the police cannot be too cautious whenever they have to deal with female apartments. As far as I can gather, this is the first case in which this question has arisen, and now that I am constrained to hold that a police officer may break into a Zenana, in search of an offender accused of a cognizable offence, it may be well to consider whether section 48 should not be extended to Calcutta. It must be remembered that many comparatively light offences are classed as cognizable here. In England a police officer can arrest, without a warrant, only in most serious cases, such as murder or forgery: here if two men quarrel and have a scuffle, and one dislocates the top joint of his little finger, it is considered a serious offence, and the police may arrest the offender without any warrant being necessary. As a warrant can always be applied for and obtained in Calcutta in a few minutes such powers would seem to be unnecessary."

In this connection we cannot say that Mr. Handley exactly suited the action to the word, the word to the action. Yet there is no conflict. On the contrary, there is a fine and ample appropriateness between his action—by which we mean his order—and his speech. The latter is a necessary complement of the other. The judgment is the best justification of the order, because of its straightforward sensible explanation. As our Southern contemporary writes—

"This is a very practical, business-like way of considering the matter, and no doubt so far as the Presidency and the larger towns of India are concerned where a warrant can be obtained in a few minutes, it would be as well for all parties if the police would make it a practice to apply for a warrant before searching a house. In many places in the mofussil, however, where Magistrates are few and far between, great difficulty is sometimes experienced by the police in procuring warrants, and much precious time must necessarily be lost in a great number of cases before a house can be searched. On the other hand as the Magistrate pointed out, the police in India can—and do—take cognizance of a number of cases of a trivial nature, and the unrestricted right of search in such cases opens the door to the police Zoolum, which forms such a constant topic of complaint among Natives. The Zenana question too, is one that requires very delicate handling, and though it must be admitted that the police very seldom abuse their authority in this direction, still it might be as well if it were rendered compulsory for the police to obtain a warrant before proceeding to enter rooms set apart for Zenanas."

We commend to the attention of the public and the authorities these words as the evident outcome of knowledge and experience. The writer indeed has had opportunities of comparing the methods of two different states and systems and their respective practical results. Residing now in a native capital, he must be specially aware of the jealousy with which the people guard the privacy of their homes and the women's apartments in particular.

Mr. Handley's judgment discloses a real blot in the criminal procedure governing the Presidency Towns. There does not seem to be sufficient ground for the difference between the law here and the law in the country at large. We hope the subject will attract the attention of the public, so that the legislature may be moved to remove the anomaly.

LAST month, the Municipal Commissioners by a resolution requested the Health Officer to withdraw certain remarks he had made on the action of the Complaints Committee. Dr. Simpson has thus answered to the Secretary the resolution:—

"I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your Memo. No. 2552, dated 16th June 1890, and I have in consequence carefully reconsidered my note of the 20th March addressed direct to the Chairman, and I can find nothing in it which incorrectly represents my views, or which is exaggerated or which in my judgment ought to have wounded the susceptibilities of the Sub-Committee, and I regret that I cannot, therefore, consistently with my duties as Health Officer of the city and my own self-respect, withdraw the remarks referred to."

The Commissioners at their last meeting would not take up this matter but have taken time to consider their next resolution. We are sorry for our Commissioners, the more so for the singular absence of harmony among themselves on a question of honour of the whole body. The Europeans think it none of their business. They all vote solid for the Commissioners' humiliation, though many of them think—rightly or wrongly—and say—"aside"—their officer was to blame. This unhappy division in the municipal camp on the one occasion in which our representatives (for all are more or less directly representative) might be expected to present the spectacle of a united phalanx, is, to our mind, the most disheartening part of the business. For the rest, the Commissioners have brought their situation themselves. It never does to push an advantage to the extreme. It is neither honourable nor expedient to reduce a man to the dust because he is down, or back one because he happens to be in your power. Cruelty or harshness is not even policy. In the long run it never pays to act according to the cynical cry of—"Kick him, he has no friends," or "No mercy! the fellow is completely in our clutches." Under the mysterious government of the universe, the fellow may possibly prove a Tartar. As for friends, they start up from the ground as it were. For, after all, the Almighty is the friend of the weak. Power and all advantages are a trust which should not be abused. The Commissioners, as they expect respect, should show it themselves to others—even to their servants. We believe Dr. Simpson's original remarks were not quite so respectful as they should have been. But, even at the worst, a lapse of language is not a grave offence. It would have been enough if the Commissioners had noticed it and passed it over—with a warning at most. They cannot have forgotten the difficulty they experienced in getting a proper Health Officer. Surely, they were not going, even if they had the power, to dispense with the services of so remarkably competent an officer as Dr. Simpson, specially invited from Europe for the purpose! If they had observed moderation, the public feeling would have gone against him. Instead, we are afraid, they will now find all the sympathy with their officer.

THERE is an interesting letter in the correspondence columns of the East giving the news of the Tangail subdivision. After giving an account of a pro-Congress meeting on the 4th June, the writer regrets the spirit of opposition to the Congress among the Mahomedans supposed to be fomented by a Mahomedan B. A. who is the Rural Sub-Registrar of Pakullah.

"At a recent Congress meeting held at Delduar the seat of the four Mahomedan Zemindars of Atia, at the instance of Mr. Abdul Hamid Khan, the able Editor of Ahamadi, this gentleman opposed the meeting and denounced the Congress. Subsequently an anti-Congress meeting was held at Karatia, probably at the instance of the same gentleman."

The writer then remarks—

"It is much to be regretted that many people oppose the Congress through ignorance. A pamphlet in Bengalee explaining in an easy way the objects of the Congress is a want which is keenly felt by the friends of the Congress."

Why so? Are there no such tracts in the vernacular? We know the celebrated "Old Man's Hope" was translated into Bengali by a member of the Tagore family, as into the vernaculars of other Provinces too by different hands. So, doubtless, other tracts. Is there no Bengali version of Mr. Hume's no less famous Dialogue on Representative Government? We have not seen any. Our Dacca contemporary's correspondent has touched on a real flaw in the management of the movement. In an agitation in the name and interest of the nation, with so much energy and money freely expended in the composition and printing and publication of pamphlets and papers in English, it seems incredible that there is no Congress vade mecum in the language of the millions of Bengal.

Here is a short paragraph of local news from the Tangail letter in the East:—

"The Bhattacharjee Talukdars of Bethair have become notorious for their internal quarrels. Although the contending parties bear near relations to each other and occupy the position of spiritual guides in the Hindu society, their conduct with regard to each other is brutal and despicable. Not many years ago, in a dispute between them a murder was committed and then recently one member of the Bhutta-charjee family was brutally assaulted and now in a squabble two men have been badly wounded. The present case is now under inquiry and we hope full justice will be done to it by the Sub-Divisional Magistrate of Tangail."

It appears that

"Influenza is raging furiously in the town and the interior of Tangail. Such a fell disease, spreading its infection like a wild fire is altogether new here."

The writer contemplates with anxiety the possibility of the new disease reappearing periodically, like Cholera and Small-pox. He may well feel alarm for his poor countrymen. The worst about these maladies is their tenacity of existence. They may be crushed to all appearance, but they are not wholly eradicated. Once they are in a country, they are never out of it. They settle in the land, lurking in some obscure corner—holding possession of some unfortunate constitution—until at a favorable moment they again spring upon others and once more spread apace with the old virulence! Thus, we still hear of cases of dengue, from time to time. So may it be with this nasty Influenza—God forbid!

THE Lieutenant-Governor returns to the capital next Friday, reaching Sealdah at 11 in the forenoon. Sir Stuart Bayley holds the Durbar for conferment of titles on the 15th, and starts on his monsoon tour on the 21st.

THE Damooda has burst its bank or rather breached its embankment, and there is distress. A telegram to the Lieutenant-Governor says:—

"The villages of Lakhara, Barugram, Nasipore, Bolorampore, Gungarampore and Salindanga in the district of Burdwan, on the right bank of the Damooda, are in great distress, for two new breaches on the Damooda embankment have occurred during the recent unprecedented flood. Cattle and implements of agriculture have floated away, many houses have been thrown down and others dilapidated. Standing crops are destroyed and arable land covered with sand. Many people are houseless, the rice granaries are destroyed and the distress is great. Immediate relief is necessary."

THE Maharani of Cooch Behar has given birth to a son—her fifth child, and there is rejoicing at the capital.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1890.

THE REFORM OF THE POLICE.

THE subject of crime and of more effective control of crime is receiving careful consideration at the hands of the Government of India as well as of the subordinate Governments. Some improvement on our present methods may well be expected to be the result of an overhauling of the whole question. But the prospect of reform in the personnel of the police does not appear quite promising. Reform to be effective in this as in other matters is mainly a question of cost, and it is, indeed, much to be regretted that, whenever a large increase of expenditure has to be faced as the prime condition of a reform, our Government fight shy of the situation. The same is the case in the present instance.

Of course, there are other factors in the problem of improved criminal administration, besides the police. Some of these do not involve the necessity of increased expenditure. The administration of the criminal law by courts of justice is susceptible of amendment, particularly in regard to a stricter enforcement of the law against habitual offenders and the greater prevention of crime. A better system of tightening the hold on habitual criminals—stricter enforcement of provisions of the Indian Penal Code and the Criminal Procedure Code relating to their punishment—more solidarity between the rural and the regular police as well as between the police of one province and another and the Government police and the police of Native States—all these are desiderata which may be removed without necessarily incurring a great increase of expenditure. Administrative changes in these directions may reasonably be looked for from the movement now on foot. And these changes will have no doubt their due effect on the control and prevention of crime. But there is no adequate reform without an improvement of the police. This must be admitted to be the chief factor, and it is as regards this, that the question of reform, from its dependence on important financial issues, presents the greatest difficulty.

So far at any rate, as Bengal is concerned, there appears to be much divergence of views between the Local and the Supreme Governments, as to what should be considered adequate pay for the police—adequate, that is, to the nature of its duties, and for the purpose of improving its efficiency and character. The following extract from a letter of the Government of India to the Bengal Government will show how the case stands between the two Governments:—

"The Lieutenant-Governor expresses the opinion that the head constables should not as a rule be placed in charge of thanas or outposts, and should not be employed in the investigation of offences. These functions the Lieutenant-Governor would restrict to sub-inspectors, but adds that to carry out this improvement it would be necessary to increase the number and pay of this class. If this view of the Lieutenant-Governor only implies that no officer should be employed in the investigation of crime, whose pay and position do not fortify him against the temptations attaching to his employment, the Governor-General in Council fully concurs in it, but it seems to His Excellency in Council that if the position of head constables is improved, there is no reason why they should not be more generally employed in the conduct of investigations. Sub-Inspectors in Bengal are at present divided into five grades, on Rs. 30, Rs. 50, Rs. 60, Rs. 70, and Rs. 80, respectively, while head-constables are divided into four grades, on Rs. 10, Rs. 15, Rs. 20, and Rs. 25. These rates and this gradation of pay seem to His Excellency in Council to require reconsideration, and he would suggest that the class of sub-inspectors might consist of three grades, on Rs. 50, Rs. 75, and Rs. 100, while the head-constables in charge of police stations or posts might also be divided into three grades, on Rs. 25, Rs. 30, and Rs. 40 a month, with a station-house allowance varying according to the importance of their charge from Rs. 5 to Rs. 10 a month.

"In making these suggestions the Governor-General in Council does not wish that the precise scale of pay proposed should be regarded as absolutely fixed: it will be for the Local Government to say whether it is sufficient or more than sufficient, having regard to the circumstances of Bengal, it must however be considered as essential that the position of investigating officers should be improved without delay. There appear from the latest information before the Government of India to be 904 sub-inspectors and 2,351 head-constables employed in Bengal, and some set-off against the increased expenditure involved in the above proposals might possibly be secured by increasing the number of head-constables and decreasing the number of sub-inspectors employed in charge of police stations.

"The question of the position of inspectors is not referred to by the Government of Bengal. Their pay at present ranges from Rs. 100 to Rs. 250 a month, and they have for all practical purposes no prospect of advancement beyond a first grade inspectorship. The Governor-General in Council would be glad if the minimum pay of an inspector could be raised to Rs. 150, and he thinks that deserving and competent inspectors might be promoted as deputy magistrates and collectors in the provincial service, especially as the work of many deputy magistrates and collectors must, the Governor-General in Council apprehends, tend to become more and more purely magisterial.

"With reference to what is said below with regard to prosecutors, it seems desirable that a certain number of the officers attached to the Courts should have the rank of inspector, but no one should be eligible for such a post unless he has passed either the Pleader's examination so far as it relates to Criminal Law and Evidence or an examination of equal difficulty to be prescribed by the Local Government.

"The pay of constables in Bengal ranges from Rs. 6 to Rs. 9. The Governor-General in Council fears that Rs. 6 is too low a rate of pay and he would be glad if it could be arranged, that no constable should receive less than Rs. 7 net pay.

"I am now to ask that the preceding remarks may be taken into his Honour's consideration and a scheme submitted with the usual proposition statement which while paying due regard to financial considerations will place the police of Bengal upon a satisfactory basis as regards pay and promotion."

The scale of pay suggested by the Supreme Government is scarcely likely to secure the desired end. That Government profess their entire concurrence in the necessity of improving the pay and position of the lower grades of the police service so as to fortify it against temptations, but this object can only be attained at a cost which the Government do not appear at all prepared to incur. The proposals of the Government of Bengal do by no means err on the side of over-liberality. Probably, this Government would recommend a more liberal scale of expenditure if there were not those very financial considerations in their view on which the Government lay so much stress. But as Sir Auckland Colvin, in a trenchant minute which he has written on the subject, roundly says, there is no hope of any reform unless the Government of India were prepared to sanction a sufficient increase of expenditure and that from the Imperial exchequer. The Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces and Oudh speaks out freely:—

"As I have already said the Government of India must be prepared, if the results of any such inquiry are to be of use, to contribute to the resulting increase of charge. If it is left to the Local Government to furnish the funds which may be deemed necessary, I feel little hesitation in saying that the inquiry had better not be set on foot. I have already expressed my conviction that suggestions for reform, emanating from the Government of India and requiring considerable increase of expenditure, unless accompanied by practical proof of the desire of the Government of India for reform by the contribution of substantial financial aid, have, if costly, little chance of being cordially adopted by local Governments, or activity prosecuted to completion."

The question is put by Sir Auckland in its just lights. No half-measures would avail. The one remedy is a liberal scale of pay, and if the finances of the Imperial Exchequer would not allow it, the present enquiry had better not been started. For the rest, the scale recommended by the Government of India would be attended with some increase of expenditure without any corresponding advantage.

SIR RICHARD GARTH ON THE CONGRESS.

No one probably has read Sir Richard Garth's recent letter in the Times on the Congress's demand for elective Councils without admiring the judicial temper which he brings to the consideration of a vexed question. His views do great honor to himself and to the position he lately filled in this country as its highest judiciary. We do not agree in all that he says on the subject of Lord Cross's Indian Councils Bill. He is far from satisfied with this moderate measure. His free-born English instincts are repelled from a measure, which, while it makes some cautious advances, leaves the whole initiative in the hands of the Executive Government. We feel, however, differently, and are thankful for the concessions which it offers. These concessions mark one stage of the experiment in administrative progress, and an experiment is wisely approached with caution. All the same, however, do we acknowledge Sir Richard's calm and independent deliverance on the subject. Apart from the merits of the question, it is such example of fairness and impartiality in individual Englishmen that goes a great way to invest the race with the respect it enjoys in general estimation. Here is a late high functionary of the State and an Englishman who feels no hesitation in condemning a Bill deliberately devised by his own Government at a peculiar juncture. Sir Richard Garth's opinion of Lord Cross's Bill is expressed in the following terms in his letter to the Times :—

"What we do want in the Councils (and in this I believe I am quite in accord with your correspondent) is a selection of the best men, as honest and independent as we can find, to represent all classes and interests of the community. We want to see the landed interests, the trading, commercial, and manufacturing interests, the legal and judicial elements, fairly and properly represented.

But it seems to me, in the first place, that the Government Bill, in its present form affords no sufficient room for a representation of this kind; and, in the next place, I think that no selection of additional members will be satisfactory to the public which is made by the Government itself.

I wish I could take a favourable view of the Government Bill, but it really seems to me in its present shape to concede little or nothing.

There are now ten additional members of the Supreme Legislative Council selected by the Governor-General. The Bill says that there must be ten, and there may be sixteen, such members, but still all selected by the Governor-General; and whether he appoints the six extra members or not is entirely at his own option.

The Bill certainly provides that a discussion of the Budget should take place in each year, and allows questions to be asked of the Government officials; but it is impossible to say what these provisions mean, without knowing the rules and conditions by which the proceedings are to be regulated, and which will be entirely under the control of the Secretary of State.

It will be observed that there is no power given to move for the production of papers or accounts, and, however objectionable any item of the Budget may be, there is no means of taking the opinion of the Council upon it. I confess I should have thought that some more liberal measure of reform at the present important juncture might have been both politic and advisable. But at the same time I am bound to add that if anything could justify the Government in shutting its doors to any reform at all, it would be the extravagance and danger of the Congress pretensions as disclosed by Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill."

Sir Richard condemns Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill in more unequivocal terms. As the opinion of an eminent judicial officer and of one in sympathy with the cause of liberal administration in this country, his words must possess peculiar interest at the present time. We therefore quote him in extenso :—

"When Lord Dufferin made his now famous speech at Calcutta, on the eve of his departure, I confess I was one of those who thought that he did the Congress an injustice by imputing to them an intention to introduce into India a Parliamentary system such as that which prevails in Great Britain. It seemed to me that at that time there was nothing in the Congress programme, nor indeed, in the less-guarded utterances of some of their more zealous partizans, to warrant any imputation of the kind.

But it turns out now that Lord Dufferin was right. His keener instincts had evidently divined what was the real aim and object of native ambition, and he did well to warn his European friends against the danger which threatened them.

For it is indeed, in my humble judgment, a most serious danger. Much as I desire to see a wholesome reform in the Legislative Councils, much as I deplore the many grievances of which our Indian friends have reason to complain, I believe it would be far better for us all that matters should remain in their present condition than that Mr. Bradlaugh's proposals, even in a modified form, should pass into a law.

The result of his Bill would inevitably be to place all the elective seats in the Councils in the hands of the Hindoos, to the exclusion of all the other great sections and interests of the community except the Mahomedans. Under Clause 27 of the Bill, which professes to protect the interests of minorities, the Mahomedans might secure a small proportion of the seats in each electoral body; but whether this would avail them anything in obtaining admission to the Councils is another matter. The Hindoos would command nearly four-fifths of the vote, and it is probable, therefore, that none but Hindoos would be elected.

Need I add that such a result would tend to set class against class, would be productive of the bitterest feelings of animosity, and would be utterly destructive of the very purpose for which the reform of the Councils has been so much desired.

The truth is that, in order to remedy the defect of the Councils, we want no representation of the bulk of the people, the great majority of whom are unable to read or write and are quite incapable of independent thought or action. Popular representation in the present state of things must needs place all the power in the hands of Hindoos and no one knows this better than their Bengalee leaders."

The Congress has been hoist in its own petard. Its tactics are bringing their own punishment. It is most unfortunate from every point of view that Mr. Bradlaugh ever launched an extravagant and impracticable scheme like his Bill. From the first it was doomed itself, but that it threatens the other measure with miscarriage is a great mischief which yet will be realized. One by one the Congress is losing its friends and supporters. The other day a pillar of the movement gave way in the person of no less a man than Sir T. Madhava Row. And now another sympathetic friend is gone. Sir Richard's opposition to the Congress programme is a serious embarrassment. They hounded Sir Madhava after his resignation, but how will they take Sir Richard Garth's changed attitude? Sir Madhava has never shown himself to be a partizan, any more than Sir Richard Garth. It is the extravagance of the Congress that is repelling its own friends.

THE REIS AND RAYYET DEFAMATION CASE.

THE POLICE COURT.—JULY 2.

(Before A. P. Handley, Esq., Offg. Chief Presidency Magistrate.)

The adjourned case of defamation against Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, Editor, and Mutty Lal Ghose, Printer, of Reis and Rayyet, at the instance of Baboo Nagendro Nath Mullick and his brother Baboo Jogendro Nath Mullick, sons of the late Baboo Deno Nath Mullick, was resumed to-day. Mr. Garth, instructed by Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, appeared for the prosecution, and Mr. Henderson, with Mr. A. F. M. Abdur Rahman, instructed by Mr. N. C. Bose, and Baboo Kanye Lal Mookerjee, for the defence.

Mr. Henderson said that since the last occasion, when the case was adjourned for the purpose of considering what steps the defence would take, his client had given very careful consideration and serious thought to the matter, and having consulted with his friends and counsel on the subject, he had, as advised, come to the conclusion to plead not guilty to the charge. In fact, there was a legal difficulty in pleading guilty to a charge of defamation, which, as stated in the summons, alleged intention to hurt or wound the feelings of a person. His client had no such intention. Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee considered the deceased, Deno Nath Mullick, to be a public man of the Hindu community, and in the acceptance of the word in native society—in any other sense there could hardly be a public man in a country without a Parliament, or public life, as understood in Europe—and, recognising him as such, considered the discussion of his life was of public interest and the general good. In discussing the life of the deceased as a public man, Dr. Mookerjee never intended to hurt the feelings of the sons, or to cause pain to any of the members of the family of the deceased gentleman. On finding that the articles did cause pain and hurt the feelings of the complainants and the family, he had, on the last occasion, expressed sincere regret. He now again expressed regret and desired to state that in the publications in question he had no personal malice or animosity against the deceased or any of the members of his family. Under the circumstances, he could not plead guilty, and therefore denied the charge. At the same time, the defence were anxious not to throw any obstacle or opposition in the way of the prosecution, and even now, although pleading not guilty, he would not go into the case, but would ask the Court to try it here and dispose of the case at once.

Mr. Garth declined to accept an apology on those terms and without a plea of guilty. He thought that what had been said aggravated the offence, as the articles were of such a nature as must have hurt the feelings of any decent son of any father. The explanation that the defendant did not think the articles would hurt the feelings of the sons of the deceased, or cause pain to any of the deceased, or cause pain to any of the members of his family, and had no intention of doing so, could only mean that he considered the sons were wholly lost to all sense of decency and respect for their father, and would not mind what was said of him. Mr. Garth, under the circumstances, must press the charge, and ask the Court to commit the case to the Sessions.

His Worship observed that, as both parties were Hindoo gentlemen of position, he thought the case ought to be committed to the Sessions, where it might be tried by a mixed jury of Hindoo and European gentlemen. His Worship then directed that the charge, as stated in the summons, be read out to the defendant Dr. Mookerjee, who was then to be asked to plead to it.

Dr. Mookerjee said he was perfectly aware what the charges were, and there would be no necessity to read them over. He would simply plead not guilty.

His Worship, addressing Mr. Garth :—Am I to understand that the charge against the printer is withdrawn?

Mr. Garth :—Yes, your Honor.

His Worship to the defendant :—You reserve your defence?

Dr. Mookerjee :—Yes, your Honor.

His Worship :—Do you desire to call any witnesses?

Dr. Mookerjee :—No, your Honor. Not at present.

His Worship :—You are then committed for trial, and warned to be present at the High Court at the opening of the next Sessions.

No recognizances were taken nor sureties demanded.

THE INDIGO DISTURBANCES AT MAGURAH.

Since the memorable case of the Rev. Mr. Long, and the day of the late Baboo Harish Chunder Mookerjee, these Indigo disturbances were kept alive like ash-covered and smouldering fire, ready to burst in all fury with every puff of blowing wind. They have, as is generally supposed, never totally died out, but almost from year to year give out sparkling flames. Although, after the famous Indigo Commission, several factories and concerns in Bengal have been closed, and the indigo production is becoming a decaying trade every year, yet several factories do still exist and close at our doors. The Nowhatta concern of Magurah, under Mr. Savi, was one such. During the weak régime of Sir Rivers Thompson and when good Mr. Barton was the responsible district officer of Jessore, matters threatened to assume a serious character, but they were only stopped in time by the prompt measures of Messrs. Barton and Monro, the then Magistrate of Jessore and Commissioner of the Presidency Division severally. The indigo planters of Magurah were threatened with the displeasure of the Government of Bengal and some fled the country. This was in 1882. For a time all was calm and quiet. But with the present régime the depredations have once more commenced and in a more serious way. However well-meaning our present ruler may be, he seems too much under the influence of officialdom. To add to the rayyet's misfortunes, they have got a Divisional Commissioner who, undistinguished for firmness or sagacity, lets matters proceed in a leisurely way. Now the high pressure of agitation in Parliament is going to be put on the Government, we may yet have the satisfaction of finding our gods, snugly perched at different points in the Himalayas, shake off their lethargy.

The people are harassed both in Court and out of it. They have civil and criminal cases in numbers hanging over their heads. And if the present state of things continues any longer, the rayyets will be ruined irretrievably. Though the calamity may begin at Magurah yet it will surely not end there. It will sweep over the whole of India. So their case ought to be considered as a national one. The loss, on the other hand, of the planters, supported as they are with funds from the great Calcutta firms, is comparatively slender and superficial. Although they cannot continue their business with constant losses, yet they are not in danger of being ousted from their homesteads. If matters go dead against them, still an easy remedy is left them, viz., filing a schedule in the Original Side of the High Court. Moreover, these planters are helped openly by friendly officials. With the active co-operation of these and their own full and heavy purses, they seem determined to make an Ulster of Magurah.

Messrs. Barrow and Gupta, two former District Magistrates of Jessore, disclosed startling facts regarding these disputes and censured the planters strongly. The latter perceiving an evil wind blowing exercised their influence with the authorities and had them transferred thence. Afterwards they got a Magistrate of their own liking. Mr. Luson, a young civilian, not of the highest reputation, was placed in charge of the two Sub-Divisions of Magurah and Jhenidah. He summarily disposed of the cases against the rayyets and became quite a terror in so short a time. He was biased, we do not mean consciously partial, and succeeded in serving the planters. One fact does not suggest itself to our Anglo-Indian contemporaries. Is it not singular that crimes are reported to have increased in Magurah since the advent of a European Joint-Magistrate were all was quiet under the Bengalee Deputy Magistrates? They do not seek to know the reason, which is evident. Mr. Luson has got a huge magnifier in his head, otherwise how could he regard the very simple affair of throwing some clods by the indignant rayyets on the planters as if it were the bombardment of a fortress? Can a man imagine the half-starved peasants of malarial Bengal capable of driving away the well-fed Europeans? However absurd and ludicrous it may seem to others, Mr. Luson actually went to the Benodepore bat, near the scene of the disturbance, armed cap-à-pie and with equally armed sentinels. He must have been reading ghost stories in a book of Mrs. Crowe's before he set out on his journey, or dreaming the night previous of spectres, hobgoblins, "visions and chimeras dire," of

"Evil thing that walks by night

In fog, or fire, by lake, or moorish fen,

Blue meagre hag, or stubborn unlaid ghost

That breaks forth his magic chain at curfew time."

How else could he have been so agitated in both mind and body as to take such a fright? He appears to have been panic-struck. The whole affair so upturned his cerebral organ as to give him his only excuse for what he did.

By the latest news from the spot, Magurah is in a state of chaos, and who is responsible for this? As misfortunes never come alone, since the notorious Benodepore assault case, referred to above, a contingent of military police is employed there. And the effect of the display of the bayonet supplemented by the lal pagri upon the poor and illiterate peasants may be better imagined than described. The people fled from their hearth and home leaving behind their property to the tender mercies of these myrmidons of authority, and they have not yet come back. How can they come? who knows what may befall the returned fugitives? We are not ready to charge on the police every act of lawlessness that is reported from there. But it stands to reason that wherever the police backed by the military makes its appearance, zulum follows as a consequence, and there is no contending it.

Just now our educated countrymen, proud of the Western lore they have received, are moving in Congress and out for representative assemblies. What credentials have they got for the exercise of such important functions? Can they be declared fit for sitting in the Utopian Parliament of India as the representatives of the masses? Are they able to express the views of the people? As long as, we say, they do not prove themselves capable of helping the poor rayyets out of their difficulties, so long there is no guarantee that they are fit for self-government. For self-government must accompany self-abnegation. The present furnishes them with a good opportunity of proving their claim. Let them help the poor men of Magurah not by writing a few leaders in the newspapers or by stump oratory, or by the shedding of crocodile tears but in a more methodical and practical way. And let them make these oppressions things of a by-gone age and of the past, otherwise God will never help those who know not how to help others in need of such service. Let them, in fine, be up and doing.

C. C.

MONGHYR.

Jamalpure, 1st July 1890.

I am glad to inform you that the Monghyr Collectorate fraud case has come to an end. The defendant Baboo Poornoo Chunder Ghosh, who was alleged to have been implicated in the matter for passing a bill of Rs. 25 twice, has after all been honorably acquitted. But the question is, who is responsible for the large outlay already incurred in defending the case. The poor clerk had to secure the services of Mr. T. Palit and Mr. Lall Mohan Ghosh, Barristers-at-Law, from Calcutta.

The tide of reduction in the Railway offices has not yet subsided. Rumour has it, that both the Coaching and Goods Divisions of the Traffic Audit branch here, are shortly to be amalgamated. The Pav Department, Dinapore District, is likewise to be amalgamated with that of Jamalpure District. The Traffic Manager's Office, Calcutta, and that of the Deputy Traffic Manager, Jamalpure, are both to be removed to Allahabad, that being the central position of the line.

Cholera has broken out in the native quarter of the town, especially at Nayagown and its vicinity, in an epidemic form. No less than a dozen cases occurred, of which half the number, chiefly among Bengalis, proved fatal. The case of a young Bengalee Baboo treated by Baboo Ootool Nath Bose, homœopathic practitioner, has proved wonderfully successful. The small doses of medicine administered at intervals of 3 hours soon brought round the case which threatened to end fatally. The patient can now be safely said to be out of danger, and he is fast improving.

A fatal case of smallpox occurred at Janjheera, close to the European quarter of this town. The local Municipality has taken steps in right earnest, they are burning sulphur in the public streets and bye lanes. There is a proposal also to erect a shed for cholera patients and to engage a native Doctor in connection therewith. The suggestion is good no doubt in all respects, but as the disease is already upon us and if the shed cannot be built all at once, I would humbly suggest either to hire a house or to make a temporary shed, the sooner the better, to meet the crisis. The lower class of Beharis as a rule mainly die, untreated and uncared for. Baboo Dabendra Nath Chatterjee deserves thanks of the native community at large, for his indefatigable exertions and trouble in attending the patients right through without the least grudge.

A HUNDRED YEARS AFTER: OR SOME RESULTS OF THE PERMANENT SETTLEMENT.

The following paper was read before the East India Association, by Herbert J. Reynolds, Esq., C. S. I., on Monday, May 19th, 1890, the Most Hon'ble The Marquis of Ripon, K. G., C. C. S. I., being in the Chair:—

At the late meeting of the Indian Congress in Bombay, it was resolved to petition the Government to extend to other parts of India the Permanent Settlement concluded a hundred years ago by Lord Cornwallis for Bengal and Behar. It does not seem likely that this request will meet with a favourable response. The land-tax is by far the most important item of the public receipts, and it is the present policy of Government to retain for the State a reasonable share of the profits which must accrue from the progressive rise of rents, and from the extension of cultivation. Even the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is powerless to grant a permanent settlement of the smallest plot of land, without the sanction of the Governor-General in Council; and this sanction is only conceded under special circumstances, and for areas of inconsiderable extent and value.

At the same time it is significant that the request should have been made, especially when we take into account the origin and composition of the body from which it proceeds. That an assemblage of Zemindars should petition for a permanent settlement would excite no surprise. But it must be borne in mind that the Indian Congress does not specially represent the land-holding classes. Of the great Zemindars of Bengal and Behar, the Maharajah of Durbhungah is the only one (so far as I am aware) who has declared in favour of the Congress, and the great majority of the delegates are professional men, whose personal interests would rather lead them to desire a continuance of the present system. We see, therefore, that an influential meeting of our Indian fellow-subjects, a meeting which we can hardly deny to be well-informed, and which is not actuated by any selfish motives, has expressed a deliberate opinion in favour of an extension of the principle of a permanent settlement of the land-revenue; and the subject is of sufficient importance to demand the attention of this Association.

I do not, however, propose to discuss in this paper the general question raised by the resolution of the Congress. I do not feel myself competent to offer an opinion upon the point whether a permanent settlement is desirable in the North-West Provinces or the Punjab, or even whether the rayyetwaree system of Madras is better or worse than the Zemindary system of Bengal. My Indian service has been passed under the Government of Bengal, and I wish to confine myself to those matters upon which I can speak with some measure of experience and knowledge. I shall only venture, therefore, to submit, as a contribution to the formation of a sound opinion on the subject, a few remarks on some results of the Permanent Settlement in Bengal, and to add a suggestion regarding the policy which the Bengal Government should pursue in concluding some important settlements which will shortly be undertaken in that Province.

Among the many criticisms which have been levelled against Reg. I. of 1793, two—and only two—may be admitted to be of some weight and validity. It is unquestionably true that the settlement was made on very imperfect information, and without the careful inquiry which ought to have preceded so important a measure. A still more serious defect was the omission to define and safeguard the rights of the actual cultivators of the soil. The confidence which the Regulation expressed in the moderation and humanity of the Zemindars, the anticipation that they would devote themselves to the improvement of their estates, and the welfare of their tenants, was not justified by the results of the experiment. The long struggle which ensued has at last been closed by the passing of the Bengal Tenancy Act of 1885, an Act which for the first time has placed both parties under the equal protection of the law, an Act which has secured the landlord in the enjoyment of his fair rent, and has maintained the tenant in the possession of his rightful holding.

The other charges which have been brought against the settlement can be successfully repelled. It has been said that the assessment was so excessive as to ruin the Zemindars who accepted it, and that this is proved by the large number of estates which were brought to sale for arrears within a few years after the settlement was concluded. But a little consideration will show this charge to be unfounded. The sale of the estates was due to the apathy and mismanagement of the Zemindars, who failed to understand that the Government was really in earnest when it declared that sale would be the inevitable penalty of default. Those who allege the assessment to have been inequitable are bound to show how it happened that there was never any difficulty in finding purchasers for the estates, and that the purchasers found it perfectly feasible to satisfy the Government demand. It should also be borne in mind that a large proportion of the estates which were brought to sale were purchased by the dewans and managers of the original proprietors, men who were fully aware of the real value of the properties. The fact that men of this class freely bought the estates, and made large profits from the purchase of them, is a sufficient answer to the allegation that the assessment was unreasonably high.

On the other hand Lord Cornwallis, after being abused by one set of critics for having exacted too much, is blamed by another set for having demanded too little. The Permanent Settlement it is said, by limiting the Government demand in perpetuity, was a wanton sacrifice of the resources of the State for the aggrandisement of a particular class in one Province of the Empire. The consequence has been that Bengal has never since borne its fair share of the public burdens. In the Bombay Presidency, the incidence of land-revenue is Rs. 234 to every 100 persons of the population; in Madras it is Rs. 134; in the North-West Provinces, Rs. 129; and in the Punjab, Rs. 109; but in Bengal 100 persons pay only Rs. 55 of land revenue. If the Bengal land-tax could be levied at the rate which prevails in Bombay, the land revenue of Bengal, which is now about 3 crores 85 lakhs, would amount to about 16 crores of rupees; and the difference between these two sums represents the annual amount which the short-sighted liberality of Lord Cornwallis has flung into the lap of the Bengal Zemindars. And even this is not all. The disproportion may be, and probably will be, even greater hereafter than it is at present. It may well be the case, that, by the end of the twentieth century, the operation of natural causes will have increased the land-revenue of other provinces of India, without any undue pressure upon the people, to double the present rates. But so long as the British Raj shall endure, the Permanent Settlement of 1793 will be an insuperable bar to any substantial increase in the amount of land-revenue now contributed by Bengal to the public treasury. The territories administered by the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal extend over about 140,000 square miles, and of this area 120,000 square miles are permanently settled, a tract about equal to the area of the United Kingdom. Throughout the whole of this vast region, the land-revenue, the most important item of the public receipts, is fixed in perpetuity at a sum which can never be increased, while the demands on the public purse are becoming more urgent year by year. To the end of time, the tax-payers of Madras and Bombay must pay a higher land-tax than would otherwise be necessary, to atone for the error which Lord Cornwallis committed in sacrificing the just claims of Government for the benefit of the Zemindars of Bengal.

This is, undoubtedly, a grave indictment. It admits, I believe, of a full and complete answer; but that answer can only be given by a consideration of the results of the settlement as a whole. An examination of those results will perhaps lead us to the conclusion that the Permanent Settlement was a wise and statesmanlike measure; that politically it has been a tower of strength to the Empire; that, from a social and economic point of view, it has stimulated the prosperity, and fostered the intelligence, of the Province; and that, even from a strictly financial stand-point, the surrender of an increased land-tax has been in some measure compensated by the steady development of other branches of the public revenue.

The first result of the Settlement which I shall notice is, the great increase of cultivation by which it was followed. It is a trite saying, that the magic of property is able to convert sand to gold, and to turn a wilderness into a garden. The saying was never better exemplified than in the case of Bengal. The best-informed authorities were of opinion that, at the time of the Settlement, fully one-third of the cultivable area of Bengal lay uncultivated and waste. At the present day, there are whole districts in which it is scarcely possible to find a plot of unoccupied land. The sportsman has to go further and further afield in the quest of big game, and a tiger in Hooghly is almost as rare a phenomenon as it would be in Hampstead. Even the islands on the shores of the Bay, exposed as they are to inundation from stormwaves, are cultivated down to the very edge of the water. Unfortunately, no precise figures are available to show what the actual increase of rent and cultivation has been. We know, however, that the Settlement was based on an estimated rental of about 3½ crores of rupees, while the present rental is not less than 20 crores. The uncultivated area, which was reckoned to be one-third when the Settlement was made, is now believed not to exceed one-thirtieth. The marvellous change which has transformed the aspect of the country, is unquestionably due to the feeling of security produced by the Permanent Settlement, to the conviction that the worker would be left undisturbed to reap the labour of his hands and would not be compelled to share with the State the fruits of the prosperity he had created.

The next result of the Settlement has been to make Bengal the most loyal province of the Empire. It has bound up, as nothing else could do, the interests of the people with the stability of the Government. The native newspapers may sometimes put forth articles not inspired by the best taste, or couched in the most temperate language; but I have no hesitation in saying that the sentiment of Bengal is thoroughly and even ardently loyal, and that the mainspring of this loyalty is the Permanent Settlement. Not a single soldier is necessary to maintain the internal tranquillity of the Province. It may be said that this is due, not to the loyalty of the people, but to their cowardice. But such language will be held only by those whose idea of the Bengali is derived from the clerks in Calcutta offices, and from the famous passage in Macaulay's essay. The Bengal peasant is a man of different stamp from Macaulay's caricature of him. The boatmen and fishermen of the Eastern districts are a stalwart, hardy, and courageous race, prompt to assert their rights, and to combine in an organized resistance to what they deem oppression. Their resolution has been tested in two serious conflicts, in which they have come off victorious. Thirty years ago they rose up against the indigo-planters, and the planting industry is now extinct in Dacca, Mymensingh and the Twenty-four Pergunnahs, and has lost its objectionable features in the few districts of Bengal in which it survives. Thirteen years later, the determined stand made by the peasantry of Pubna in 1873 against the exactions of their landlords, was the first act of the drama which culminated in the passing of the Tenancy Law of 1885. It is surely no trifling safeguard to the Empire, that some millions of such men as these should be animated by a spirit of fervent attachment to British rule. And this attachment is largely based upon the conviction that no Power which might succeed that of England, could be trusted to respect and maintain the great Settlement of Lord Cornwallis.

Thirdly, the effect of the Settlement has been to facilitate the transfer of the ownership of land to those who were likely to turn it to the best advantage. It was the Regulation of 1793 which first recognised the right of the Zemindars to sell the whole or any part of their lands at their pleasure; and this power was freely exercised. The large unwieldy estates of the presettlement era, as they fell into arrear, were sold piecemeal to purchasers whose object was to make them a profitable investment. The number of landholders was greatly increased, and the character of the landholding classes underwent a marked change. The feudal relation of chieftain and retainer was replaced by the commercial relation of landlord and tenant. Even in the great estates which escaped dismemberment, the same result was carried out by a different process. The Zemindars found it convenient and profitable to grant out their lands in putnees and other similar tenures, at fixed rentals in perpetuity, thus reducing themselves to the position of mere annuitants in receipt of a rent-charge, and raising the putnidars to the virtual status of proprietors. From the standpoint of romance and sentiment, this change is perhaps to be regretted; but there can be no question of the great material benefit which it has produced. It has brought the land into the hands of those who were determined to make it pay; and it has stimulated the industry of the whole of the vast mass of agriculturists, as the humblest rayyet has felt it within his power to rise to the rank of a tenure-holder. A noticeable instance of the beneficial effect of sub-infeudation will be found in the condition of the district of Backergunge. The peasantry of that district enjoy a greater measure of material comfort and well-being than the corresponding class in any other part of India, or perhaps, even of the world. This is mainly due to the system of land-tenure. The chain of sub-infeudation, extending sometimes to as many as six or eight links between the Zemindar and the rayyet, has bound up the interests of a very large proportion of the people with the progress of agricultural improvement. I have been told that travellers from the Upper Provinces have spoken with wonder and admiration of the state of things they have witnessed in Backergunge, the substantial comfortable homesteads, surrounded by clumps of bamboos and fruit-trees; the abundance of brass utensils and silver ornaments; the sleek cattle, and the well fed children. This Arcadia might never have been realized if the great Zemindari had not been broken up and sub-leased under the operation of the Permanent Settlement.

Another result of the Settlement, which seems of sufficient importance to deserve notice, has been the extinction and disappearance of the putwaree or village accountant. It is worthy of notice that this official has perished in spite of the strenuous efforts of the Legislature and the Executive to keep him alive. The Government failed to perceive that the old order had changed and that under the new régime which the Settlement had introduced, the putwaree had become impossible. He was essentially a village officer, the servant at once of the Government and of the Zemindar; and so long as the village belonged to a single landlord, or to a number of landlords acting in partnership, there was nothing, in theory at least to prevent the putwaree doing good and useful service. But when the village lands were split up among a number of estates, the property of separate, and sometimes mutually hostile, landlords, the functions of the putwaree could no longer be performed. This change as I have remarked, was not understood. The Government continued to pass Regulations, and the Board of Revenue to issue Circulars, directing that putwarees should be duly appointed, that their stipends should be regularly paid and their accounts punctually submitted; and these orders invariably remained a dead letter. A last attempt to revive the putwaree was made by a Lieutenant-Governor of more than ordinary vigour and resolution, Sir George Campbell; but the logic of facts was too strong for him, and his efforts were as fruitless as those of his predecessors had been. There is nothing, however, which we need regret in his disappearance of the putwaree. He was generally an unprincipled rascal, who either colluded with the Zemindar to oppress the rayyets, or conspired with the rayyets to defraud the Zemindar; and, for all statistical purposes, his accounts were absolutely worthless. For the future, the provisions of the Tenancy Act will make it unnecessary for any village official to keep the accounts of individual rayyets, while the village accounts will be kept, in a much better style than they were ever kept by the putwaree, by the Union Committees established under the Act for Local Self-Government.

The most important result of the Settlement still remains to be noticed; I mean the effect it has had in creating and fostering the growth of a middle class in Bengal. The march of civilization and progress is impossible in any community, which consists of a handful of great nobles at one end of the scale, and a crowd of ignorant and poverty-stricken peasants at the other. Such is, perhaps, the condition of Russia at the present day; such was the condition of Bengal one hundred years ago; such is still the condition of some portions of Behar, which are among the poorest and most backward regions under the Lieutenant-Governor's authority. But, over the greater part of Bengal, the Permanent Settlement has produced a marvellous and most salutary change. I have already spoken of its effect upon the classes connected with the land, whether as owners or in subordinate grades; and it is hardly necessary to say that these form a large proportion of the population. Such men as the putnidars of Burdwan, the jotedars of Rangpore, and the talukdars of Backergunge, are the back-bone of the agricultural community. It is to such men as these that Bengal owes the introduction of jute, a crop which has added so greatly to the wealth and prosperity of the province. It is due to this agricultural middle class that famines have ceased to occur in Bengal, because the people now-a-days have something in reserve, and no longer depend entirely upon the year's harvest for the year's sustenance. But the influence of the Settlement has extended much further than this, and has permeated the whole framework of society. It has given Bengal a leisured class, men who are raised above the necessity of daily labour, and who are able to bring up their sons to a literary career, and to the pursuit of the liberal professions. It is this middle class of the community, daily increasing in numbers and in influence, and animated by the constant wish to raise itself in the social scale, which has given Bengal its honourable pre-eminence among the provinces of India for educational progress and intellectual activity. It is this which has made possible the careers of such men as Kristodas Pal and Keshub Chunder Sen. The first Indian novel was the work of a Bengali writer of this class, Pearychand Mitter; and the best Indian novelist of the present day is a Bengali Brahmin, Bunkim-chunder Chatterjee, some of whose fictions have been translated into English, and have been favourably criticized in this country. It is owing to this that twelve newspapers are published in Bengal in English, and sixty-six in the vernacular; and of the twelve English papers six are under native management, and are written by native contributors. The avidity with which the advantages of education are seized upon is shown, not only by the 6,000 lads who annually present themselves for matriculation at the Calcutta University, but by the interesting fact that there are seventeen colleges in Bengal which are entirely self-supporting, and receive no grant from the State. The rapid increase, throughout the mofussil, in the number of qualified practitioners in the three great professions of medicine, law, and civil engineering, is an important and most encouraging sign of the times. There is hardly a large village in Bengal which does not count among its residents a medical man who has studied in one of our colleges, and who possesses at least some tincture of Western science. The pleaders before the court of a district judge would compare favourably, for legal knowledge and acumen, with those who appear before the County Courts and Quarter Sessions of our own country. In a large proportion of Bengal districts, the district engineers are members of the native community. I had prepared some figures showing the steady growth of the number of letters passing through the post office, the increased use of the telegraph, the larger deposits in the postal savings-banks; but it seems unnecessary to trouble the Association with these details. The point upon which I wish to lay stress is, that this progress is due, not to the rich, not to the poor, but to the middle class of society; a class which hardly exists in some parts of India, and which owes its vitality and energy in Bengal to the agencies which were quickened into life and activity by the operation of the Permanent Settlement.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THREE DAYS OF CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS.

FROM THE FRENCH OF DELAVIGNE.

En Europe ! en Europe ! Esperez ! Plus d'espoir !
—Trois jours, leaur dit Colomb, et je vous donne un monde.

"BACK to Europe, again, let our sails be unfurled !"
—"Three days," said Columbus, "and I give you a world !"
And he pointed his finger, and looked through the Vast,
As if he beheld the bright region at last.
He sails—and the dawn, the first day, quickly leads :
He sails—and the golden horizon recedes :
He sails—till the sun, downward sinking from view,
Hides the sea and the sky with their limitless blue—
On, onward he sails, while in vain o'er the lee Down plunges the lead through the fathomless sea !

The pilot, in silence, leans mournfully o'er
The rudder, which creaks 'mid the dark billows' roar ;
He hears the hoarse moan of the waves rushing past,
And the funeral wail of the wind-stricken mast ;
The stars of far Europe have fled from the skies,
And the Cross of the South meets his terrified eyes ;
But at length the slow dawn, softly streaking the night,
Illumes the dark dome with its beautiful light.
"Columbus ! 't is day, and the darkness hath past !"
—"Day ! and what dost thou see ?"—"I see nought but the Vast !"

What matter ! he 's calm !—but ah, stranger, if you
Had your hand on his heart with such glory in view ;
Had you felt the wild throb of despair and delight
That depressed and expanded his bosom that night ;
The quick alternations as morning came near,
The chill and the fever, the rapture and fear,
You would feel that such moments exhausted the rage
And the multiplied malice and pains of an age—
You would say these three days half a lifetime have slain,
And his fame is too dear at the price of such pain.

Oh ! who can describe what the crushed heart must bear—
The delirium of hope and the lonely despair—
Of a Great Man unknown, whom his age doth despise
As a fool, 'mid the vain vulgar crowd of the wise !
Such wert thou, Galileo ! Far better to die
Than thus by a horrible effort to lie !
When you gave, by an agony deep and intense,
That lie to your labors, your reason, your sense,
To the Sun—to the Earth—to that Earth, we repeat,
That you trembled to feel moving under your feet !

The second day 's past—and Columbus ?—he sleeps,
While Mutiny round him its dark vigil keeps :

"Shall he perish ?"—"Death ! death !" is the mutinous cry,
"He must triumph to-morrow, or perjured must die !"
The ingrates ! Shall his tomb on to-morrow be made
Of that sea which his daring a highway hath made ?
Shall that sea on to-morrow, with pitiless waves,
Fling his corse on that shore which his longing eye craves ?
The corse of an unknown adventurer then—
One day later—Columbus, the greatest of men !

He dreams, how a veil drooping over the main
Is rent, at the distant horizon, in twain,
And how, from beneath, on his rapturous sight
Burst at length the New World from the darkness of night !
Oh, how fresh ! oh, how fair the new virgin earth seems !
With gold the fruits glisten, and sparkle the streams—
Green gleams on the mountains, and gladdens the isles,
And the seas and the rivers are dimpled with smiles.
"Joy ! joy !" cries Columbus, "this region is mine !"—
Ah ! not even its name, hapless dreamer, is thine !

Soon changes that dream from a vision so fair,
For he sees that the merciless Spaniards are there,
Who with loud mimic thunderbolts slaughter the host
Of the unarmed people that cover the coast.
He sees the fair palace, the temple on fire,
And the peaceful Cazique 'mid their ashes expire ;
He sees, too—oh, saddest ! oh, mournfullest sight !—
The crucifix gleam in the thick of the fight—
More terrible far than the merciless steel
Is the uplifted cross in the red hand of zeal !

He sees the earth open and reel to and fro,
And the wretches who breathe in the caverns below.
Poor captives ! whose arms, in a languid despair,
Fall fatigued on the gold of the rocks that they tear.
Pale spectres ! whose agonized cries, uncontrolled,
Seek the light of that sun that they 're ne'er to behold.
They struggle, they pant 'mid the pestilent dews,
And by labor escape the sharp whip that pursues,
Till a long, lingering death, in the cavern's dim light,
Consigns them at length to eternity's night !

Columbus, oppressed by this vision of pain,
Scares it off from his feverish pallet and brain ;
It dwindleth, it melteth, it fades from his eye,
As a light passing cloud in the depths of the sky.
All is changed !—he beholds in the wilds of the north,
Full of strength, full of hope, a new empire spring forth—
Its people oppressed, as the war-cry goes round,
Seize the peaceable ploughshare that furrows their ground,
Or that creature of iron which lately they swayed
As it turned into cities their forests of shade.

They have conquered !—they show him with grateful acclaim
Their Hero, their Washington—type of that name—

O sage Cincinnatus and Cato ! no more
Need we doubt of thy virtue, or mocking adore.
He has caused our weak hearts that strange grandeur to feel,
And conceive what corruption till now could conceal.
In the council, a Sage by the Hero is seen,
And not less revered 'neath a different mien.
He rules, he discovers, and daringly brings
Down the lightning from Heaven and the sceptre from kings.

At length, o'er Columbus, slow consciousness breaks—
"Land ! land !" cry the sailors, "land ! land !" —he awakes—
He runs—yes ! behold it !—it blesseth his sight—
The land ! O sweet spectacle ! transport ! delight !
O generous sobs which he cannot restrain !
What will Ferdinand say ? and the Future ? and Spain ?
He will lay this fair land at the foot of the throne—
His king will repay all the ills he has known —
In exchange for a world what are honors and gains ?
'Or a Crown ? but how is he rewarded ? —with chains !

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

Native Opinion writes with feeling severity of our countrymen for their apathy towards their benefactors :—

"While our people glibly talk about the ungracious discourtesy of Anglo-Indians towards their Indian fellow-subjects when retired after competence, what have they to show as emphasising their loyalty to and love for those Anglo-Indians who have devoted their whole lifetime to the welfare of the Indian people? A Bell, an Osborn and to add to their list a Knight has passed away, and what have the people done to give a concrete expression to their love beyond verbal expressions of regret in newspapers, and public meetings. The late Messrs. Fawcett and John Bright did so much for India, and how have the people requited the labours of these really great and noble men ! While an official like Sir R. Temple may for some reason or other have his memory kept as green as ever, there is nothing substantial to mark off the memories of those who have done us no end of good ! Among these may be reckoned the late Robert Knight, and what has Calcutta done to mark his memory ? There was some talk about his memorial, but as time passes every thing he has done will be quite forgotten. We are sorry our people are so forgetful when duty calls them to move and repay a debt of gratitude. Will Calcutta play the same role that we on our side did in similar other matters ?"

"THE Planters of Ceylon have decided to subscribe to a suitable memorial to perpetuate the name of Mr. James Taylor, the successful pioneer of the Tea industry in Ceylon."—Ceylon Paper.

AND will India do nothing for the memory of Robert Knight, the unofficial "Statesman and Friend of India ?"

THE Editor of the Indian Union is the true knight who reports one of the most remarkable instances of courage, pluck and devotion in a Hindu woman. He writes :—

"It is not often we hear now, a days of female heroism in India, therefore all the more notice should be taken of the bravery of Kariman, an Ahir woman, in protecting Mr. Edward William Maclean of Amlia Bahraitch, against a savage and wounded tiger, single handed. We have often enough heard of English ladies like Lady Eva Quin, Mrs. Mortilli and others, who have shot tigers from the safe security of a howdah, but we have never heard of any of these going out to tackle a tiger on foot. We cannot do better than quote a portion of the Deputy Commissioner of Bahraitch's letter, which shows the cool courage and doubtless intrepidity displayed by this Ahirni, in rescuing Mr. Maclean from the very jaws of the tiger about to devour him.

"The sahib told me to keep cool and reserve my fire till he had had a shot. He fired, and then he and I fired simultaneously. We fired again as the tiger broke. Seeing us he charged, and we took refuge behind a tree. Here the rest of the party who had fled rejoined us. The tiger remained in the nullah. We thought he was prevented from following us by the precipitous bank. The sahib said he would go back to the tiger. I implored him to avoid the danger, but he abused me, and said his face would be blackened if he retreated and left the tiger there. He said he would be killed and not I. I exchanged rifles with the Pahari, and foot to foot the sahib and I returned to the nullah. Directly we reached a crossing the tiger charged us from a distance of 20 paces. We fired, the sahib hitting him in the chest and I in the neck ; but he still came on and knocking the sahib down seized him by the shirt. I broke my rifle over the tiger's head and he turned on me, knocking me down and standing over me. The sahib seized him in order to get him away from me and the animal attacked him again. They struggled and fell together down the nullah. The sahib was more or less conscious, but the tiger was almost insensible. The sahib called out to me to shoot the tiger or he himself would be killed. I ran off and getting the Pahari's rifle I jumped down the nullah and found the sahib's hand in the tiger's mouth. He told me to shoot by the ear. I fired and the tiger released the sahib. We then hurried away. The sahib had been bitten through a hand and leg and was also scratched. I was only clawed on the head and shoulders. After dressing our wounds the sahib went back and found the tiger dead."

Our contemporary adds :—

"We hope the Government will confer some reward and decoration on this brave woman, for her deed was as noble as any action that ever yet won the Victoria Cross. As Kariman Ahirni will probably be left destitute by Mr. Maclean's death, a subscription should be got up for her, subscribed to by all classes, to keep her for the rest of her life in fairly affluent circumstances. As long as we have women of the stamp of Kariman Ahirni, there is no reason to despair of India. If only our men were endowed like this brave woman we should not occupy our present degraded position. Now that we have at length got a heroine, let us at least honor and make the most of her, and not shame ourselves by our neglect."

We concur in every word.

THE vernacular press is believed to have the monopoly of such stuff as the following, though our graver and rationalistic Anglo-Indian brethren do not disdain occasionally to fill up odds and ends of space with—tales for the marines—Brummagem apples for the simpler daws among their constituents to peck at. We now quote from our Burra Bhai Saheb of Allahabad :—

"A curious tale of the death of a tiger comes from the Sonthal Pergunnahs. A man was seated on a tree at night watching his fields, when he noticed a tiger prowling and sniffing the air and gradually approaching his perch, until it actually came under the machan, which it tried to pull down. The Sonthalce, bold by nature, sat fearlessly looking on, considering all the while as to what he should do. Quick as thought he took a red-hot iron, and as the hungry man-eater with open mouth leaped to catch his hanging leg, he dropped the bolt into its mouth and the tiger at once swallowed it— with what result it is needless to say, except that the beast was found not far off the next morning 'stark and stiff.' The only question is 'where did the red-hot iron come from ?"

No, there is another. And a prior one. Our contemporary's question suggests doubt as to the occurrence, by reason of the improbability of the poor lonely Sonthal watcher having to hand such a weapon as a red hot iron. But there is a question in natural history involving the very existence of the man's enemy. This tiger seems kin to the gaping gentry for whose enlightenment and edification the story has been served up. But do tigers shake trees or posts on top of which men might be perched in order to bring them down to the ground ? Above all, do tigers charge with mouths wide open ?

THE night of the 26th February 1891 has been fixed for the next census. It will be taken throughout India with the exception of forest and desert tracts. Mr. J. A. Baines, Bombay Civil Service, has been appointed Census Commissioner for India. The Superintendents of the operations are :

Madras	Mr. H. A. Stuart.
Bombay	Mr. W. W. Drew.
Bengal	Mr. C. J. O'Donnell.
N. W. P. and Oudh	Mr. D. E. Ballie.
Punjab	Mr. E. D. MacLagan.
Burma	Captain R. C. Temple.
Central Provinces	Mr. E. Robertson.
Assam	Mr. E. A. Geit ;
Berar	Captain Warren Hastings.

The administration of census operations will be supported by legislation. A Bill on that behalf has already been introduced into the Governor-General's Council for making laws.

ACCORDING to the Ceylon Observer, the total acreage in the Island under tea, coffee, cocoa, cardamoms, cotton, tobacco, rubber, pepper, arnatto, is 686,728, of whichasmuchas 219,487 is now planted with tea, coffee, both of the Arabian and Liberian varieties, having now only 54,680 acres. There are now 1,452 cultivated plantations with 1,211 Superintendents and Assistant Superintendents. All this marks a distinct agricultural departure.

ACCORDING to Dr. Trimen, in his Administration Report of the Peradeniya Gardens, Ceylon, for last year, one of the culms of giant bamboos grew, in April, at the rate of 13½ inches in twenty-four hours.

THE Bombay Gazette relates an extraordinary instance of depravity in a group of two legged beasts without feathers :—

"In the High Court the three men charged with the murder of a Hindu lad at Clarke Road were found guilty and sentenced to death.

The case was one of a revolting kind, and was suggestive, in the cupidity of its motives and in the callous brutality with which it was carried out, of the criminality of the peasantry of whom Zola has given an only too vivid portraiture. The prompter of the murder was a man named Pandu, the uncle of the victim; the motive had its origin in a misunderstanding between uncle and nephew as to a small property at Oorun which the latter had inherited. Superstition had come to the aid of avarice, and some curious revelations were made in the evidence as to the old man having consulted various oracles as to the time when the lad was to die. In one instance he tried to persuade a man to offer a cocoanut to his god, so as to bring about the death of the youth Raghunath. The gods were slow in working out their purposes, and men were called in aid—two Mussulmans who, with the mistress of one of them, inveigled him to a liquor house, primed him with drink and then led him to Clarke Road, where in an unscientific but effectual way they hanged him to a tree guard, leaving his body to hang there as a ghastly spectacle to people who might be taking an early ride in the neighbourhood of the race course next morning. The woman's confession was an eye-witness' account of a cruel murder, the motive for which was supplied in Rs. 50 given by the uncle. The woman turned Queen's evidence, and her confession was one of the sensational incidents in a very remarkable trial."

THE amendments to the Evidence Act as proposed in the Bill introduced last week in the Supreme Legislative Council are:—

- "(1) the provision allowing a previous conviction to be proved in all cases will be repealed;
- (2) a previous conviction will be relevant under section 43 when it is a fact in issue or otherwise relevant under the Act;
- (3) a previous conviction will be relevant as evidence of bad character, when such evidence is relevant;
- (4) a previous conviction will be relevant to prove guilty knowledge or intention;
- (5) in cases of offences relating to coining and forgery, facts showing the existence of any state of mind, such as intention or knowledge, will be relevant although those facts do not show the existence of the state of mind in reference to the particular matter in question;
- (6) in cases where the accused is tried under section 234 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1882, at one trial for three offences of the same kind, the evidence relevant to prove one offence may be used as showing guilty knowledge or intention in the case of either of the other offences;
- (7) the fact that an act formed part of a series of similar occurrences, in each of which the person doing the act was concerned, will be relevant to prove guilty knowledge or intention."

BAHAWALPUR is in a bad way, according to a Lahore paper:—

"The frequent change of Prime Ministers in the Bahawalpur State can hardly be conducive to either the general good of the administration or the interests of the State, or of the people concerned; especially as the ruler of the State seems to be gradually resigning his prerogative more and more to the Executive Council, and ceasing to take a continued and sustained personal part in the government of the State, and giving the preference to field sport. The foreign element, too, in the personnel of his immediate advisers, is obtaining undue influence; and no 'Vazir' can remain long at Bahawalpur however carefully selected, because it is not to the interest of the clique in power that he should effect reform. The great and profitable irrigation works constructed by Colonels Minchin and Grey during the régime of the British political agency appear to be neglected; and there is apparently good cause for complaint of unchecked local subordinate oppression and disregard of agricultural interests, in consequence of which cultivators of the soil are leaving for British territory, although not perhaps yet in conspicuously large numbers."

Native Opinion speaks of Lord Dufferin as

"perhaps one of the most sagacious of the Indian authorities."

That goes without saying. And yet not long ago our politicians almost to a man ignored the truism. And for saying it this journal and its conductors were boycotted. But the gratuitous revilers of Lord Dufferin are all coming round.

PERHAPS Native Opinion is no typical example. Our contemporary is far too moderate and sensible, and thinks out of the rut of Irreconcilism. Thus, in the same number, noticing the weakness and divisions of the Conservative party in England, our contemporary writes—

"To us it is a matter of no great concern whether the Conservatives or the Liberals are in power; both have done us good."

It cheers our heart to hear our countrymen talk in this rational strain, without bias in favour of any party or administration or clique in Great Britain. Such language is, however, to the majority of our "politicals," most exasperating—such moderation rank heresy.

GOAHEAD! go-ahead! nothing but go-ahead with Americans! A lady correspondent of an American newspaper, Miss Nellie Bly, has done the globe in 72 days! A male American, George Francis Train, has left the fair circumnavigator behind in the race, by 12 days, having made the tour in two months of 30 days each. No such feats were on record. This trans-Atlantic brace—this hero and this heroine of travel—have distanced in deed the very "fancy's flight" of M. Vernon. That volatile French romancist could only think of taking his readers Round the World in Ninety days—not an hour less.

WE announced last week that Mr. Moro Vishwanath Joshi, who went to England in April to support the Indian Congress, had returned under compulsion of ill health.

It would seem that he had practically carried out nearly the whole of his programme, having been present at several meetings, notably at that at Reading. Not much more was done afterwards. The last meeting took place on the 15th June and with it the campaign is over. Our Bengali brother Baboo Surendra Nath Banerjee, the lion of the Indian visitors, has returned home. He has come by way of Bombay of course, where they gave him a hearty reception at the Framji Cowasji Institute on the afternoon of Sunday, the 6th instant. Meanwhile, our friend Mr. Nam Joshi, of Poona, has left for Europe on the same errand, it is said. Will there be another campaign begun now?

THERE is an ice scarcity in the United States. In India where we used for a long series of years to depend on American ice, the news comes with something of the shock that an announcement of failure of coal in Newcastle would come upon the world in general. In many cities of the Union, ice is scarcely to be had, and in most of them it can be obtained at famine rates. The failure is attributed to a milder winter, an earlier summer and the extension of industries in which ice is essential.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE British Cabinet is being reconstructed. On Thursday it was reported that Mr. Smith goes to the Upper Chamber, making room for Lord Randolph Churchill as leader in the Lower House. That telegram is contradicted today, for we are told Mr. Smith has already expressed to a friend his intention to stand for re-election.

Government have abandoned the proposals to amend the procedure of the House of Commons, as also the Land Purchase and Tithes Bills during the present session, reserving them for the next which would assemble at the end of November. That saves, we hope, the Indian Councils Bill. The Darkest African Convention is being legalized in England. A Bill for the cession of Heligoland has been read in the House of Lords. At the debate on the second reading, on the 10th, Lord Salisbury justified the cession of that island which was of no use to England but would be a burden in time of war. The convention, he maintained, removed all sources of conflict with Germany in that quarter, and enabled England, with the British protectorate over Zanzibar, to cope with the slave trade, while Vitu has secured the road to Egypt.

France objected to the British protectorate over Zanzibar as opposed to the Treaty with her. The English Cabinet has admitted the objection and is willing to compensate by extension of the powers of France in the island of Madagascar. Such concessions cannot, however, go without objection. A memorial numerously signed by the members of the House of Commons protests against the Convention and the proposed cession.

THERE has been a handy little White mutiny in the British Army at Home. On the morning of the 7th, the second Battalion of the Grenadier Guards, stationed at Wellington Barracks, London, did not answer the Bugle call for kit inspection and hooted and hissed the Colonel. They were put in confinement, and the Yorkshire Regiment ordered up to London to assist the Grenadiers in their work. The order against insubordination has since been withdrawn, the War Office deciding that the duties of the Grenadier Guards were excessive.

Other revolts are also reported—among the Metropolitan Police, the Postmen, the Telegraph clerks, and the Albert Dockers.

In the Albert Docks, the dockers have struck work and the British India steamer Golconda is lying idle. All, however, is quiet with the Grenadier Guards and the Metropolitan Police Force. The Postmen still continue their meetings. Their Union in London announces a general strike until the right of meeting and free communication are recognized.

THE rumour has been revived at Hyderabad of Sir Dennis Fitzpatrick's succeeding to the Government of Bengal in November, when Sir H. Durand returns.

UNDER date the 2nd July, 1890, appearing in the Gazette of India of the 5th following, the Government of India, in the Foreign Department, quietly publishes the order that the provisions of Finance Department notification, No. 2036, dated the 30th June 1882, issued under section 9 of the Indian Stamp Act, I of 1879, as applied to the Hyderabad Assigned Districts by Foreign Department notification, No. 114-I-J., dated the 4th June 1879, shall be deemed to have applied to the aforesaid districts from the 25th October 1882. Except to those in the secret, the order is wholly unintelligible. There is no knowing whether the present order removes a real grievance or justifies an ancient wrong.

THE Government of India is not yet reconciled to the Parliamentary order for the abolition of the Contagious Diseases Act. For the benefit of cantonments in British India, it has been ruled, under the new Cantonments Act, 1889, that as many hospitals as may be found necessary will be maintained within or without the cantonment limits, out of the cantonment fund, either wholly or partially, for treatment of persons suffering from infectious or contagious disorders. Each hospital will be under the charge of a medical officer to be appointed by the local Government, the Cantonment authority and the District Magistrate regulating the number of hospitals. Once admitted, a person will be treated gratuitously and when a resident of the cantonment or taken at request of the cantonment authority shall receive a subsistence allowance. When any such medical officer certifies or supposes that a person, whether resident or not of any cantonment, is suffering from any of those disorders, such person must go to the hospital and remain there until discharged. On his refusal to go into the hospital or to remain there till pronounced free from the disorder, he is liable to be banished from the cantonment within 24 hours or prohibited from remaining in or re-entering the cantonment without leave of the medical officer. The penalty for disobedience is a fine of Rs. 50 or imprisonment for eight days for every breach.

It is proposed to add the following to the Rules under the Indian Emigration Act, XXI of 1883:—

"The drinking-water, limejuice, ghee, flour, rice, meal, &c., shall be frequently tested by the Surgeon Superintendent for the purpose of detecting the presence of lead or copper therein."

The reason of the addition will be found in the following extract from the Report of the Government Analytical Chemist of British Guiana for the year 1888:—

"The most noteworthy of the poisoning cases was that of the captain and crew of the East Indian ship—who reached this port suffering from chronic lead poisoning. The water on board being suspected, seven samples of it were brought to the laboratory by the Health Officer. No lead being detected, it was determined to examine such of the ship's stores as were used in common by captain and crew. These were tea, lime juice, and ghee. The latter was found to be the cause of the mischief, as it contained 5·12 grains of lead to the pound. Those attacked recovered under treatment at the Colonial Hospital, although some but narrowly escaped death. Had the—carried immigrants, the consequences of using such ghee would no doubt have been very disastrous, especially if the Medical Superintendent had not possessed the means of detecting lead and, as would be probable, suspected only the water."

The same scientific officer makes the following suggestion for avoiding such accidents in future:—

"To provide against such a mishap occurring, it might be advisable to include amongst the medical stores a simple and ready test for lead. A small bottle of sulphide of ammonium, one of strong hydrochloric acid, and a piece of glass rod would be sufficient."

He gives simple directions for the use of these materials for testing the presence of lead:—

"To test the water, a cup or any small white vessel should be about half filled with it, and a drop of sulphide stirred in with the glass rod. Any iron, lead or copper contained in the water, even to a smaller extent than 1/10 of a grain per gallon, would be shown by an inky colouration appearing more or less deep according to the quantity. Should such a change occur, then a drop of hydrochloric acid should be stirred in, when the colour will disappear instantly if due to iron, but persist if due to lead or copper. It is unnecessary to distinguish between lead and copper, as both are highly dangerous.

"To test limejuice, two or three drops of the sulphide may be added to a small quantity. A darkening indicates lead or copper.

"To test ghee, flour, rice, meal, or any right coloured food, about 30 minims of sulphide and an equal measure of the acid should be added separately to two ounces of water and a portion of the food well stirred with the mixture, lead or copper being indicated by the darkening that occurs. Tested in this manner, the ghee from the _____ became like boot blacking. The materials for the test cost only a few pence."

In the proposed addition to the Rules, we notice the omission of tea among the supplies to be tested. Tea is liable to serious adulteration—the green tea of commerce is poison itself—and it is far too important an article to be implied within the ample range of "&c." But a graver defect is the omission to fix the times when the stores are to be examined. The word "frequently" is vague. Instead of it, the times or occasions should be specified.

The matter is of the highest importance. Not only because it concerns the health and lives of navigators and ship-passengers, but because the periodicity of such accidents on board must retard—and might almost prohibit—emigration. And it is on emigration we must principally depend for disposing of the surplus of our ever-increasing population to the best advantage, without pressing unduly upon the economical condition of the country.

WE have during these months been repeatedly reproached in private for neglecting the memory of Robert Knight, by gentlemen who knew his friendship for us. To all our explanations, many of them have retorted, Never mind heads of society or other leading men or this or that, why not start a Fund yourself. Knowing the petty jealousies which pervade a community like ours brought up under foreign domination and influences, we refrained in the very interest of the cause we had at heart, contenting ourselves with pointing out the Indian Mirror, the only native daily, as the journal which should, as it is entitled to, take the lead in the movement. Better late than never, and we are glad to see that that journal has broken the ice. It is very creditable to the public spirit of Bombay that one of her distinguished citizens, Mr. Perozeshah Mehta, has overcome the inertia of Bengal and enabled the Mirror to open a subscription with a contribution from him of Rs. 100. We hope our countrymen of all races and classes from all parts will follow up briskly and liberally.

It never rains but it pours. So at this moment. It is one continual drip—drip—drip—nothing but dripping—for us in especial—in public as in private. So early in the year as June and July, it seems as if

"November chill blows w' angry sigh"

—from every side. There is no end to our turpitude and truculence. Bad-headed and bad-hearted, we are not only sinful but reckless and obstinate. Hence everybody's hand is against us. Our enemies are within and without. The most implacable are of our own kith and kin, to say nothing of so-called friends and admirers—of a time when we enjoyed the luxuries of approbation and patronage. They whom we should look up to to save make no scruple to give us up to massacre. They who might be expected to come forward with zeal in the worst extremity to extend the ægis of protection have themselves led us into a hole. Our sins are various as well as numberless—political, social, legal, moral, literary and what not besides. John Bull in the East is too sacred a Brahminy bull to care for native rags, but a Scotchman of all has appeared at the nick of time to detect our literary imposture and our frauds on our customers. (We dare say so regular a reader, as he confesses himself, is a subscriber.) He had too long nursed his rage against us for our partiality for Poesy to wait to reduce it to form and file his indictment at a proper time. His complaint is of several counts. First and foremost, we have offended Dr. Dryasdust by "regularly devoting our first page to poetry, week by week, under the heading Contemporary Poetry." Secondly, we last week committed the aggravation of laying before our readers under that heading Aytoun's "Massacre of Glencoe," which is included in the Professor's collected Lays. Thereby we committed a literary sin—the crass stupidity of not knowing the meaning of contemporary. By "contemporary poetry," according to this Scotch teacher of English, is understood the poetry of the year—now, of 1890! Why not the poetry of the month? or of the week? or of the day? or of the hour? or of the passing moment? May it not mean the poetry of last year? Or of the year before last? or of ten years' back? So it seems, contemporary means "of the year." And so all the words from the same principal root, we dare say, such as temporal, temporally, and the rest. They all convey the impression of something better than ephemeral, but lasting no more than a twelvemonth! Well may we exclaim, in the terms of the much-abused Latin quotation, used for once to the point—O tempora! O mores!

O Time! the beautifier of the dead,
Adorner of the ruin, comforter
And only healer when the heart hath bled—
Time! the corrector where our judgments err,
The test of truth, love,—sole philosopher,
For all beside are sophists, from thy thrift,
Which never loses though it doth defer—
Time, the avenger!

to what low uses hast thou been reduced! We, for our part, must plead guilty to having taken the word in a more liberal and wider sense. The phrase "Contemporary Poetry" has been with us almost a synonyme for Victorian Poetry. We are, next, accused of a fraud on the public in having cribbed from the Lays without the slightest acknowledgment. But the very heading, taking it at even the niggardly North British meaning, absolves us. This Scotch detective has simply entangled himself in his own inconsistency.

The reason why we did not give Aytoun's name is, that we are not fortunate, like our censor, in the possession of the Professor's book. We came across the poem in an old American periodical itself copying from a British source.

We think a generous brither who loved his country might, notwithstanding his possession of Aytoun's volume, have been glad to have another opportunity of reading a spirited rendering of one of the most memorable and affecting incidents in his national annals, without handing over to the Police a black man on the banks of the Hoogly, who appreciates and tries to make his fellow blacks cultivate the Muse of Great Britain, not excepting Scotland. Is he a Campbell?

WE learn that at the last meeting of the Rajshahye Hindu Sabha, it was resolved to send a Memorial to Government, praying for a law making it penal to kill a bull consecrated at the shrad ceremony of the Hindus. The Maharaja of Nator has, it is said, agreed to bear the entire cost of the agitation on the subject. The orthodox associations will be asked to join the movement, and the whole Hindu community will be appealed to. Our Rajshahye friends are moderate and more practical than the extreme antibovicides. If they do not succeed they will not irritate other classes, and certainly not work the mischief which the enthusiasts and agitators like Sriman threaten. We will say no more at this stage, but wait for their Memorial to see how they meet the obvious reply to their suggestion.

HIGH EDUCATION IN THE PUNJAB.

THE MODERATION TRICK.

THE cause of high education in the Punjab must be always indebted to Dr. Rattigan. The Vice-Chancellor of the Punjab University is a strenuous, outspoken enemy of every "fad" and fancy likely to injure that cause. And his knowledge of the affairs of Universities in general and of Punjab education in particular, makes him a formidable enemy indeed. The other day we saw him fighting manfully the battle of the existing University standards. It is the day of congresses and conferences to be sure, but India unfortunately is the land of officials and officiousness and the very Paradise of sciolists, laymen, ignorant doctrinaires, jacks-of-all-trades, and humbugs of sorts. The North Western Frontier Province of India has its fair share of the characteristics of the times and of the phenomena of the Empire, and Dr. Rattigan has his proportion of trouble therefrom. His calamity—the thorn in his Vice-Chancellorial flesh—is a nondescript board which exercises the function of irresponsible criticism and suggestion on education as carried on in the Province. Although composed of somewhat heterogeneous elements, it is a very respectable body beyond question, but it is unfortunately subject to the blues. These good gentlemen are not at all happy. They are not satisfied with the rate at which the educational mill manufactures under-graduates and graduates of different grades and indifferent departments of learning. Accordingly, proposals have been made by this Educational Conference to debase the Higher Education of the Province. The prestige of the University as well as the cause of Culture was at stake, and Dr. Rattigan's tender sympathies for liberal education were touched. He could not rest without entering his earnest protest against a movement which had not even the support of experience. How far his voice would avail against an apparently strong combination, we cannot say. In any case, however, he will have done his duty and entitled himself to the gratitude of all true friends of high education in this country.

Dr. Rattigan has had again to take up the glove. He is once more in the field—against the same Educational Conference. Another lucid, trenchant and closely argued minute from his pen, against the proposed appointment of Moderators, is before us. Like their recommendation for lowering the standards, the Educational Conference base their present proposal for the appointment of Moderators upon the example of the Calcutta University. How, in the face of the late scandals of the Calcutta University, any body of intelligent men could be bewitched by such an example, particularly when those scandals are yet under enquiry, must be strange to every body else. But why this zeal for imitation? Apart from other reasons, the Punjab University was ostensibly founded on an independent footing. As shown by the Vice-Chancellor in his memorandum which we noticed before, the rules of its examinations "were originally framed with the deliberate intention of adopting an independent standard, and were sanctioned on that footing."

The Education Conference do scant respect to the University authorities by reviving a proposal which they have quite lately rejected after deliberate consideration, and those authorities will only stultify themselves by their acceptance of it. The thing is, the proposal does not come before the University as a res integra. On the contrary, it was very fully considered in 1888, and deliberately rejected in favor of another scheme, viz., the appointment of a Board of Studies. This latter system was ultimately approved by the Senate, and sanctioned by the Punjab Government. To revive a proposal so recently discarded after such full and deliberate consideration, is scarcely fair or honorable. On this point, Dr. Rattigan speaks with great candour. He writes:—

"If the Resolutions of the Syndicate and Senate are to obtain any respect at all, they ought not to be liable to constant and radical changes. No confidence can surely be inspired in the wisdom of any of their Resolutions if the latter are liable to the variations of the hour; and if the deliberate opinion of the Senate on a particular question, arrived at after full discussion, is to be again opened out almost before the ink with which it was recorded has dried, and a diametrically opposite conclusion agreed to, I can only express my opinion that such a course of procedure will not only break all continuity in the action of the Senate, which is most undesirable, but will also stultify that body in the eyes of the general public and of the Government. I do not of course mean to say that the Resolutions of the Senate of the Punjab University should be like the Laws of the Medes and Persians, incapable of alteration or modification when once passed. That would be to claim for this body an infallibility which it cannot assert, and also to ignore the necessity of change which progress and development in the Department of Education as in other departments frequently demand. But what I contend for is, that except where some such necessity as the above exists, or where it can be shown that a previous Resolution of the Senate is impracticable or has distinctly failed to attain the object aimed at, the deliberate acts of this body at one meeting ought not to be lightly set aside at another meeting. Self-respect alone ought to dictate the observance of the rule of procedure I contend for, and I venture very strongly to insist upon it in the present case. It appears to me that those who now advocate a change, so soon after the matter was set at rest by the previous Resolutions of the Senate, are bound to show a very strong case to justify the Senate in undoing what it has already deliberately sanctioned. If they cannot make out this case, their proposals ought to be rejected in limine."

The Education Conference are bound to make out a strong case against a system adopted after elaborate discussion by the Syndicate, the Senate, and ultimately the Government, before they can fairly launch their new scheme. The object of moderation is

"(a) To scrutinise, in consultation with the Registrar, the papers of Examiners before they are printed or lithographed.

"(b) To make such alterations, in consultation with the Registrar, in the question papers as they consider necessary. As far as possible this shall be done in consultation with the Examiners.

"(c) To re-examine a sufficient number of answer papers in order to see whether the Examiners have complied with the University Regulations in their system of marking, and, if necessary, to direct the Examiner to revise his marks."

But this is attended with the danger of leakage, which experience and recent events have shown to be inevitable from the scrutiny of question-papers before the examination. The Board of Studies is intended to avoid this very danger. It maintains the responsibility of the Registrar and his office against leakage, and to secure fairness and uniformity in examination, provides for consideration of any valid objections to a question paper, in consultation with the examiner, before he made his award. These are the two schemes. One of them has been only recently accepted, and before it has been in operation for full one year, the repudiated rival again thrusts its claims. It is bad enough in the Conference to raise the ghost of an exploded idea. But a stranger thing is how the Arts Faculty could bring themselves to adopt the proposal for the appointment of Moderators after having formally negatived that proposal a short while ago. Any attempt to spring a mine of this kind in a court of justice would be at once snubbed with a single phrase—Res judicata. But though the University is not a court, it is, we trust, amenable to common sense. And the doctrine of res judicata is no naughty or foolish technicality, but a maxim of reason, and justice, conducive to human peace and convenience.

There is no case as yet against the Board of Studies. On the contrary, the Vice-Chancellor has conclusively shown that it has quite fulfilled its expectations, so far as the short time it has been at work gives indications for forming an opinion. The Vice-Chancellor does not bring forward this statement by way of triumph for the success of his own original proposal. He is forced to it merely to refute an ex cathedra statement of the Conference that it has failed. It has not failed. On the contrary, the indications are rather on the other side. At any rate, there has not been time enough for an opinion one way or the other. There has been little experience on which to found a formal verdict, while so far as it has gone, the verdict should be rather in favor of retaining than discarding the system that is on trial.

Holloway's Pills.—The ills of life are increased tenfold by the mode of life so many have to lead; most especially is this the case amongst the toilers in our factories and huge workshops of the manufacturing districts, whose digestions become impaired and nervous systems debilitated by the protracted confinement and enforced deprivation of healthy out-of-door exercise. The factory workers may almost be said to have diseases of their own, readily amenable, however, to treatment if not allowed to proceed unchecked. Holloway's Pills are the most effectual remedy ever discovered for the cure of liver and stomach complaints, as they act surely but gently, regulating the secretions without weakening the nerves or interfering with the daily work.

On this point, the Vice-Chancellor must speak with authority, and he says :—

"Now if 'experience' had proved that the arrangements I have referred to had failed in their object, I would myself be foremost to advocate the adoption of more effective measures. But it is precisely here that I am compelled to draw issue with the statement embodied in the Resolution of the Arts Faculty quoted in the preceding paragraph. Let us then see if it is the fact, that experience has proved anything of the kind? The first and obvious remark that must occur to one to make in this connection is, that an experience which is limited to the short period of one year is scarcely deserving of the name. The term implies the repeated trial of a matter. In the present case has there been such a repeated trial of the arrangements deliberately adopted by the Senate? Let the facts speak for themselves. In the first place, only two sets of University Examinations have been held since the Resolution of the Senate came into operation, and the first of these, namely, the Examinations of 1889, were held at a time when the Model Papers had not been prepared, and consequently at a time when the present arrangements were not complete, and had only been partially in operation less than three months. Can it be justly said, therefore, that a very limited experience of this kind justifies the sweeping condemnation of those arrangements by the Arts Faculty? I conceive not. But let us examine this experience, such as it is, still more closely. It will be seen that the general results of the Examinations for 1889, with the exception of the English B. A. and M. A. Examinations, were (as I have shown in a previous Memorandum) remarkably satisfactory, and this notwithstanding that the Model Papers had not yet been circulated as guides. The failures in English were most probably due to a special cause which I have also mentioned in the same Memorandum. In the present year's Examinations the general results have been still more satisfactory, and the only signal failures have been again in English at the M. A. Examination. How far these last mentioned failures can be attributed to the present arrangements for the moderation of question papers may be disposed of in very few words. The Examiners selected by the Arts Faculty were Professors Webb and Peterson, two very experienced and competent Examiners, and no objection that I am aware of has been raised against the Question Papers set by these gentlemen. I am therefore unable to find that, so far as achieved results go, the present arrangements can be said to have failed to meet the object for which they were devised; while, so far as preventing leakage, I am in a position to say that these arrangements have been crowned with marked success, for not a single case of leakage has occurred since the new rule came into operation."

The interference of Moderators is not always of a healthy kind, and may sometimes lead to awkward situations. A contretemps lately occurred in consequence of so-called moderation which had almost threatened a postponement of an examination. The story is interesting and throws much light on the beauty of moderation, and even at the risk of lengthening our article, we will let the Vice-Chancellor relate it himself :—

"Now the only question paper that was objected to on the Arts side, so far as I have been able to ascertain, was that set in English for the Intermediate candidates by Mr. Barrett, the Director of Public Instruction of Berar, Central Provinces. This paper was objected to in a very curt letter addressed to the Registrar by Mr. Robertson, then Professor of English in the Lahore Government College, which, at his request, was forwarded to the Examiner, with the unfortunate result that the Examiner, a gentleman of exceptional ability and experience, declined to submit to such criticisms or to act as an Examiner for our University. Had the Rule regulating the duties of the Board of Studies been properly observed, this unfortunate contretemps would in all probability have been avoided, as I felt it my duty to point out to the Board in a Memorandum I wrote on the subject at the time and which is appended hereto (vide Appendix). But the mistake had been committed, and under the Rules I was placed in the awkward position of having to nominate another gentleman (as Mr. Barrett positively declined to act further) to examine on Mr. Barrett's paper. Fortunately Mr. W. Bell, who has on more than one occasion rendered me valuable assistance on an emergency, agreed to undertake this task, and there was no need for further action. But had he declined, the Intermediate Examination would necessarily have had to be postponed, which would have been a very unfortunate occurrence. I may further mention that Mr. Bell assured me that he considered Mr. Barrett's paper an admirable one to which no reasonable objection could be taken. Now I would ask to what conclusion does the above unfortunate contretemps lead? Does it prove that the present arrangements do not fulfil their object, or does it not rather supply a strong argument against the intervention of individual Moderators as proposed by the Arts Faculty, showing that such a practice would be attended with considerable risk of conflict arising between an individual Moderator and an experienced Examiner, who, like Mr. Barrett, would naturally not brook to have his work sharply criticised by the former? I most unhesitatingly say the latter is the more just conclusion, and for the following reasons :—first, that the existing Rule requiring any objection to be first submitted to a responsible and representative body like the Board of Studies, whose representations would, it may be reasonably expected, carry weight while the remarks of a single Moderator might only lead to irritation, was not observed, and therefore what subsequently happened was a consequence not of the unfitness of the present Rule, but of its non-observance; secondly, that the conflict of opinion between Mr. Robertson, who objected to Mr. Barrett's paper, and Mr. Bell, who assured me that the paper was an admirable and suitable one, shows the risk of allowing individual Professors to act as Moderators in their own subjects, a risk which is altogether obviated by leaving the decision in the hands of an influential and representative body like a Board of Studies constituted under the existing Rule; and thirdly, that the actual results of the Examination prove incontestably that Mr. Barrett's paper was not an unsuitable paper, either with reference to its length or the distribution of its questions, for no less than 86.8 per cent. of the candidates passed in it, upon marks awarded by Mr. Bell himself."

This is a fine illustration of the absurdity of that system. Examiners appointed by the University are presumably men of knowledge and of educational experience, who may well be left to frame questions in their own special subjects. It is casting no small slur upon such men to have their questions scrutinised by another set of men who may not always be of superior qualifications. It is not to be expected that questions set by one man should in every particular suit themselves to the judgment or taste of another. They may be free from objections for all practical purposes, and yet objections may be taken upon the slightest possible pretexts. Like the proverbial differences of tastes, may be differences between examiners and moderators, with results scarcely consistent with the self-respect of individuals, or the smooth and satisfactory despatch of business.

As to the objection on the score of leakage, the system of moderation stands thoroughly condemned on this point alone. The disclosures recently made in Calcutta and Bombay, are of a sufficiently serious kind to make one pause in following their methods. At these Universities, examinations have been vitiated by the leaking out of questions before the dates of those examinations, while it speaks volumes for the superiority of the Punjab system that since 1887 not a single instance of leakage has occurred there. In the presence of such plain facts, it is surely wonderful how the system of Moderators could still command admiration. The Calcutta University is by no means an exemplary model. It is itself not satisfied with its own arrangements. There is constant change, and not a year knows what the next may bring forth. At the present moment, it is thinking of having examiners unconnected with the actual work of teaching the subjects in which they set questions. Whether this arrangement will be worked in conjunction with the system of moderation or not, we do not know, but should it be found feasible, the latter system ought to go. At any rate, men with delicate feelings of self-respect but otherwise quite desirable as examiners may hesitate to accept the doubtful compliment.

THE DEFAMATION CASE.

OUR lips are sealed. Here are some of the remarks of brethren in the press on this subject.

Hope of July 3 writes :—

"We regret to see that the case of defamation against the Editor of Reis and Rayyet could not be amicably settled, and Dr. Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee has been committed to take his trial at the next Criminal Sessions, beginning on the 14th instant. Dr. Mookerjee expressed his regret for having caused pain and annoyance to the plaintiffs, sons of the late Baboo Dena Nath Mullick, by writing about their father, but this regret was not accepted by the plaintiffs as sufficient amends unless the Doctor pleaded guilty to the charge of defamation at the same time. This, however, the Editor of Reis and Rayyet declined to do, not merely under legal advice, but because he conscientiously believed to have never borne any malice against the plaintiffs, nor to have intended to wound their feelings; though having come to know that their feelings were wounded he was ready to express his regret.

"We wish the plaintiffs had accepted this expression of regret and refrained from pursuing the case further. If the Editor of Reis and Rayyet conscientiously believes that the alleged defamatory article was written with the purpose of doing good to the public and nobody any harm, no punishment he may get at the Sessions would change his intellectual conviction, while if he were to plead guilty against this conviction he would be telling a lie. All that, therefore, the plaintiffs could get, or are trying to get, by pursuing the case is either a hypocritical confession from Dr. Mookerjee or a punishment upon him, neither of which would be likely to do them any good, not to speak of bringing a desirable return for the money they would have to spend; while they are already having all that a gentleman need have as redress for wounded feelings, namely, the expression of regret from the offending party.

If the suit had been instituted in a civil court, and damages claimed in money, we might have seen sense in the prosecution; as it is, it betrays more a desire to give tit for tat than to obtain redress. We write this in the interests of social peace and with the motto 'forgive and forget' in our mind, without prejudice for or against either side; and certainly we have not taken upon ourselves to express any opinion on the merits of the case."

The Bengalee of July 5 says:—

"The case against the Editor and the Printer of the Reis and Rayyet for defamation came on for hearing on Thursday before last. Of course it was very good of the Editor to have taken upon himself the whole responsibility of what appeared in his paper, to the exclusion of the Printer. As regards the principal defendant, his counsel Mr. Henderson stated to the Court that his client now wished to express his 'fullest regret' for the publication of the articles complained of. But Mr. Garth appearing for the prosecution observed that he could not accept the apology and the expression of regret now tendered, unless the Editor pleaded guilty to the charge; and one of the reasons why he said so, was that the accused had not availed of the opportunity given him, previous to the institution of the present proceedings, of making 'a public apology in a public way.' Thereupon Mr. Henderson prayed for an adjournment, in order to consider whether the case would be proceeded with, or a plea of guilty recorded with the expression of regret. But the Magistrate would not grant the application without the consent of the other side; and accordingly some evidence of publication was gone into, after which the case was adjourned by consent to Wednesday last, the 2nd July instant. On the 2nd, the accused refused to plead guilty to the charge, and the case was committed to the Sessions. Of course we are not at liberty to make any comments at this stage, but we may say, without being guilty of any impropriety, that it would have been satisfactory to all parties concerned, if the matter could be settled out of Court."

Native Opinion (Bombay) of July 6 writes:—

"We are grieved to learn that the apology tendered by the management of the Calcutta Reis and Rayyet having been deemed insufficient by the other side, the case has been committed to the Calcutta Sessions. We are not aware of the merits of the case, nevertheless we should have liked to see a compromise brought about between the two parties."

The Press in fact is reduced to silence.

Hereafter we may publish, if advised, some of the many private testimonies of sympathy.

POLICE RECONSTRUCTION.

I think we ought to be glad to observe that His Excellency the Viceroy has left Calcutta without issuing any orders on the long expected changes in the Police administration. It is strange that but few of the Indian papers, European or native, have as yet thought of ventilating the numerous grievances of the people against this Department. The condition of the Police is generally admitted to be one of the blots of the British administration. That Service is gradually getting worse, while there is no department which so vitally affects the wellbeing of the whole of the 300 millions of the Indian population.

A couple of members of the National Congress, at the Allahabad meeting in 1888-89, referred to the deficiencies of the Police, but it was done in a half-hearted way as if they were afraid of offending the members of the Department present at the door of the meeting tent. They spoke only on the legal side of the question, without any regard to the financial, and the only remedy they could suggest, was to double the pay of the Police all round.

It may be truly asserted, without any intentional disrespect to the present administration, that the present system is rotten to its core. Of course it has gradually deteriorated. The chief causes of the debasement of the Police are the extinction of the military element in the protective branch and the location in the responsible positions of District Superintendents and Assistant District Superintendents of young men as inexperienced for the command of disciplined bodies as for judicial duties. This evil is mainly to be traced to that constitutional weakness—Patronage—the making of places for favoured individuals, instead of searching for candidates who have shown a natural aptitude for those most important charges. The greatest and worst change, perhaps, has been the neglect of the true principle for the detection of crime, viz., the enforcing the aid of landlords. The terms of their still stereotyped leases with Government show that the original principle was, that the landlord, the most interested for good order in his locality, as by his original position the most capable of preventing, detecting, and tracing crime, was to be held mainly responsible; and his executives allowed full power over the village watchman, Chowkidar. Let Government now call for explanations, how, when and why the main principles have been suffered to die out in our older Provinces. It is noteworthy that the Chief Commissioner of our latest annexation (Burma) has not only resuscitated the old system in a province that never before knew order, and under the disadvantage of having only newly appointed Headmen (lumberdars as we term them) generally from men without the advantages of hereditary local influence: he has obtained from Government an Act to give these Headmen magisterial powers. Considering the constant transition state of our Government by its 5 years' rule for tenure of appointments, it is to be feared that few even of the Secretariat could satisfactorily trace the course of these deteriorating changes.

We are fallen on evil times. The last of the great rulers before the present era, Lords Dalhousie and Canning, our great annexing and consolidating administrators respectively, untrammelled by Secretaries of State, or Parliamentary inquisitions, supported by advisers and assistants like the Lawrences, Outrams, Montgomeries, Macleods, Drummonds and Durands, all officers of historical fame, decided, among other reforms, on the decentralization system, making the Deputy-Commissioner or Magistrate of the District, the central unit of sole power within his charge; but Parliamentary disturbers to administration, demanding abolition of the Government opium monopoly on one side, the reduction of Income tax, for the powerful merchant and mahajan, on another, the abolition of cotton dues for Lancashire votes, &c., making retrenchments for classes, the wants of the silent masses are forgotten.

Magistrates of Districts with ever increasing duties, deprived of European assistants, were and are glad to let their Police assistants work their wicked will on a defenceless public, unchecked. The Police no longer military beyond uniformity of costume, being employed concurrently with the Zemindars' village establishments for detecting and prosecuting crime, they soon picked up the abuses of the old Thanadar system, and found that the Zemindars were in their way, for lucrative arrangement with parties in cases. European officers (particularly the inexperienced, when not in touch with the people), were always inclined to believe their own subordinates, exceptionally immaculate! and were easily convinced that "Zemindari aid was only necessary as a dernier resort," and that those who were seemingly carrying out their "terms with Government for detecting crime, were in reality either obstructive or in collusion with defendants. So officers began to rely solely on their own men. Thus was the first main principle gradually dropped, leaving the Police—blind because without local knowledge—a fair field to create a traffic in crime, so much so that it may now be positively asserted, without fear of contradiction, that hardly a single chullah reaches the Magistrate's Court that has not been paid for by one, if not by both parties, often to double the amount of the original injury, where it is assessable in Rupees. The Police thus being pecuniarily interested in detection of crime, invariably arrest some one (as the Congresswallah said) without much regard whether he was the real offender or not. Dacoities and offences by gangs are not trifles of easy digestion even by the Police; in such cases (aided all round) seldom are dacoits allowed to escape the law, except when a Tantia Topi rises; but how many are the instances in which village communities, to avoid the dreaded Police visitation, gladly contribute the inevitable tax, for hushing up petty or even heinous offences?

Any respectable fearless Zemindar will confirm the assertion, that Police abuses have reached to such a state that the people often would prefer the attack of a gang of Dacoits, whom they may be able to resist, than the approach of a body of Police, against whose attack on their purses (on perfectly constitutional principles) they are perfectly powerless. These abuses are now so notorious throughout the land that no judicial or Police officer can possibly admit ignorance of their existence. "But accepting as a rule, that it is impossible to put down bribery, corruption or even extortion among such a people ever ready to pay" (yes, in self defence), each officer saves his own conscience in believing, "that general repute may say the evil is general; but under his own superior careful supervision, with his own specially selected establishment" (he is in such personal touch with,) "a practice of such evils is impossible, exceptional, or at any rate reduced to a minimum."

No doubt all Judicial and Police officers will pronounce the above description of our Police administration as grossly exaggerated, but when many of these cases are not exposed, till they reach the Sessions and the High Courts in the shape of extortion and torture, all that can be said is, that when all District officers are worked off their legs, with all sorts of (seemingly) unnecessary work, how can they be expected to supervise the subordinates.

The Pioneer informs us that His Honor of the N.-W. P. is now having the meetings of a Committee of Police reform, sitting three times a week at Naini Tal.

We must hope that their recommendations may tend to follow the example of Burma, starting with a return to the old system of requiring landlords to interest themselves in carrying out more fully the terms of their leases and of Government trusting them with the same magisterial powers as now in Burma. To enable them to do this, the appointment and dismissal of chowkidars must be restored to them fully.

When the congested state of the files of every court in the country, high and low, criminal and civil, is known to be caused by the time uselessly wasted by highly paid officers on the most frivolous cases, which by the examination of returns would be found to be the cause of so many prosecutions, resulting in dismissals, is it not desirable then for committees to search for a remedy for these failures?

It may be confidently asserted, that one half of these petty cases, now thrown to mystify our courts, are from spite, or at the instigation of one of the shoals of pleaders and mooktears, (created by high class education), thrown over the country, men whose sole chance of a livelihood is to encourage litigation among their ignorant neighbours. Frivolous cases would not for a moment be raised if parties knew that they would be heard by the headmen of their villages, who are personally acquainted with all the feuds of their locality.

Without doubt there are many instances of actual misappropriation of property between neighbours solely from spite, that invariably would amicably be settled by the Zemindar of the village to the satisfaction of parties, and to the saving of the purses of both, which are now, by the instigation of the mischief-making village lawyer, made over to the Police, and once in their hands, would appear before the Sudder Magistrate as a theft, house-breaking possibly (according to payment) with an additional charge of "with preparation for murder." When it is considered, that there is hardly an officer, who on entering his Court finds he has less than 8 to 15 cases on the cause list for the day (to say nothing of other miscellaneous duties such as Treasury, Local funds, Tehsal or Thanah reports), how is it possible for him to find time to carefully sift evidence of parties or witnesses he knows nothing of and vicing with each other in concocting false or at any rate grossly exaggerated evidence? Even the prosecutor of a true charge fancies he must strengthen his case by lies. Every one must know, that the great difficulty in all judicial and civil proceedings is to ascertain the value of evidence of a deponent. Is it not then a needless waste of power, when we have, for every village, the valuable machinery of a village headman, the hereditary head of the locality (during the Rebellion of '57 shown to be their accepted chief) for us to neglect such aid? In most instances it may be taken for granted that these respected men are fully acquainted with every detail of a case, and how it occurred. They are fully acquainted not only with the characters of both parties, but their feelings towards each other, and could settle their differences, not only to the saving of valuable time of Government officers, but I repeat for the benefit of parties themselves, without the baneful intervention of Government servants, with its opportunities for bribery and corruption of the Police and the Amla. As a fact I believe 50 per cent. of the offences committed (true and frivolous) themselves create as many cases of extortion. The Allahabad Congresswalla implied that the Government supervision of returns even forced the Police to concoct crime for individuals to keep their places or obtain promotion.

If the Burma Headmen law be extended to the N.-W. P. or to any part of India, the first change necessary would be to separate the Police into the two distinct branches of Protective and Detective, as at present in Burma, the latter solely under the control of their own landlords who should be held responsible for the detection of all crimes within their holdings, unless they are able to trace delinquents beyond their own jurisdiction. For such cases, a few selected men, of the same class, should be entertained for Government and be kept under the orders of the Inspectors of Divisions to help to connect and continue the trace from the village where crime occurs, to that of residence of defendants, the lumbaradar of which would then be drawn into the responsibility for detection. One of the great advantages of restoring zemindari responsibility would be that landlords would, in self defence, have to interest themselves to watch the bad characters of their villages, both the known thieves as well as the receivers of stolen property. Can there be a doubt, that it is owing to the want of supervision of these two classes, that thefts and burglaries increase? Instances can be pointed to, in proof, by returns, that where magistrates have accepted their charges against badmashes, crime in those localities have ceased or decreased.

For the Protective branch of the Police, are required men of superior manly stature, of the Irish constabulary sort, men whose respectability of appearance and commanding aspect (above the ordinary run of men) would at once overawe disturbance and command obedience. These should be of the class from which are drawn our men for flank companies in the old Indian Army, of not less than 5' 10" in height, 39 and 40 inches round the chest, with discipline enforced perfectly, as in the army. On no account or occasion, should they be employed as detectives, or as witnesses in cases, beyond the conduct of prisoners placed under their charge. The nature of duties for Protective and Detective Police are so perfectly different, it is useless to expect the men of either to be good for both.

Let a sepoy but once have the opportunity of obtaining a dishonest penny by suborning or withholding evidence, he is no longer fit for the (should be) honoured Protective Police. The old Indian army, enlisting young fellows who only visited their homes once in 5 or 6 years, constantly kept under military discipline, encouraged in manly sports, or on service in plucky adventures, never allowed the opportunity of any sordid trade, were made into quite different men from the ordinary menial or trade classes he was enlisted from. Many instances can be found in European as well as Native regiments of orderlies of officers allowed to act as house stewards, who have been, by the baneful effect of avarice, perfectly ruined as soldiers.

If Government would but resuscitate zemindari responsibility and relieve the Police proper of detective duties (which can be effected without any strain on the finances) well might the Protective branch be reduced to half of the present establishment and, by that saving, allow an increase of pay to the few selected ones retained. For so urgent and radical a change, let not the principle of absorption be permitted--let not a superior class be contaminated by the evil schooling of the present class. The recruit for first year should receive Rs. 6 with no half monthly deductions. Let Magistrates of Districts be interested, and jointly responsible, in selection of Protective Police, who should not be passed beyond their protective term except by the Inspector-General or his military deputies. The probationers being passed should receive an increase of $\frac{1}{4}$ pay, for every year's good service, punishment short of dismissal being the suspension of this annual promotion. This should on no account be left to the advice of subordinates but should require the sanction of the Magistrate of the District. The services of such a force being certainly equal, if not superior, to the native line regiments, their pensions and privileges should be similar. The different grades of head constables should be considered as staff appointments granted for ability, rectitude of character, not as seniority promotion to smart personal orderlies; reduction to ranks or to a lower grade as punishments being confirmed by the Magistrate of the District. This by itself would relieve the force of the jealousy from supersession, one of the greatest banes to military efficiency.

One of the fads of the old Indian Army is now being applied to the Police, viz., that one of the greatest encouragements for enlisting is the hope of promotion to the "Commanding ranks." A mere fallacy! Sir Henry Lawrence in 1847-48 with his thorough knowledge of native character established the feudal system for his local army, appointing to the Commanding ranks only men of good family, who were able to bring with them a certain number of their own clan or followers for enlistment into their troops or companies. There can be little doubt that in the old Indian Army, most of the heart-burnings in 1857, incentives to rebellion, were caused by the promotion of low caste men to the Commissioned ranks. For the police are required native officers, men as socially different from the ranks, as the Protective should be different from the Detective Police. Inspectors of all grades should not only be a superior class of native gentlemen of good families, but they should be men of education, who in their private life have had opportunities of taking part in Police enquiries, to show they have an aptitude for such duties, not as is often the case now, sycophant hangers-on to officers, or sisters, cozes and aunts of the favorite peshi amla of Courts, got up for the occasion in a milkwhite chapkan, tight and highly worked Benares putarider cap.

To detect the details of the many evils gradually grown into our Police system, the opinion of our now numerous European landlords and grantees, manufacturers of mills and trade works, with a large selection of natives in the same positions, men selected for their known intelligence, should be sought--not that of the sycophant Durbarees of Districts, who it is to be feared were drawn into some of our late Public Service enquiries, men who sought rather to find out what would be most pleasing to the officers enquiring--all class trap show, for the benefit of Parliamentary inquiries on Indian subjects!

Oh, what a world we live in nowadays in India! Unlimited personal patronage, under a 5 years' rule for tenure of appointments! A competition system unchecked by certificates of moral character, high class education for the low caste masses, local self-government--all works of the Devil flooded under a wave of democracy! Many Police officers would no doubt exclaim that if detection of crime be left to landlords, its report will only altogether be suppressed, but checks can be found against all evils. It is not suggested that our present chowkeedari reports should be discontinued but as a perfect check against landlords, and at the same time as a security for them against charges of suppression of crime. It is suggested that Putwarees should send records of all crime in simplest laconic form by hands of the chowkeedar, while after being recorded in Thanah for Roznamchas, after initialing by the Thanader or his deputy, be returned by the chowkeedar to the landlord for his file. No notice need be taken of such reports even for Police cognizable cases, unless the landlord in his report applies for the aid of the Protective police or in cases of defendants not captured being reported as belonging to another village, when the report would apply for an investigating officer (according to circumstances) with or without escort. It is the feeding and exactions of a body of Government servants, police or civil, that the disinterested body of villagers most dread. As a further check against abuse of power and suppression of crime, the provisions of Section 167 Criminal Procedure Code as to the 24 hours periods for defendants after arrest to be taken to the nearest Magistrate for order or trial, should be applied to landlords, without magisterial powers, unless they can report adjustment of differences between parties. In many cases, we may take it for granted that perfect justice would not be done, that many cases will escape report altogether, in some places, where Zemindars have strong influence, crime ceases altogether. At any rate, there need be no fear that aggrieved parties would not appear before District Magistrates if their claims are not adjusted, in fact with much less fear than now, when the police have cooked evidence to turn a burglary into an indecent assault, a murder into a suicide.

European officers however must accept as facts that it is invariably the interest of their subordinates to discolour and conceal all facts from their superiors to retain power, and for their own benefit, that it is next to impossible for a native subordinate, police or civil, to be placed in any position of power, without abusing it, for his own benefit, that there is nothing that the innocent side of the native public dread more than indirect local enquiry by a subordinate agency, 99 per cent of whom are open to the highest bidder, that it is only those who are in the wrong, those actuated by spite or avarice to obtain injustice, who desire trial by an official court and readily accept the aid of a legal adviser, the instigator of litigation; the injured or the innocent would much sooner prefer reference to Panchait or trial by their own local chiefs.

MAHOMEDANS AND THE CHRISTIAN NATIONS.

(From the Overland Mail, June 6, 1890.)

Our esteemed friend Nawab Abdool Lutef, whose name is so well known in connection with Mahomedan interests in Bengal, and indeed throughout India, as well as for the genial and liberal spirit he evinces toward his Hindoo fellow-subjects, has sent us a letter from Calcutta on the recent suppression in Paris of a play which was to have travestied the life of the Prophet. The Indian Mahomedans took a keen interest in the question, and very widely adopted a resolution not to attend any theatres if, what they naturally regarded as a profane insult to Mahomedan feeling, were allowed to be perpetrated on the boards of a theatre in a Christian nation. On similar grounds Mme. Sarah Bernhardt has lately been prevented by the French authorities from representing on the stage the Virgin Mary. Nawab Abdool Lutef gives an instance of the suppression of an objectionable play of the same character some years ago in Calcutta, and it is pleasing to observe that he was able also to appeal successfully to the Hindoo publisher to withdraw from circulation the printed copies of the play. In India leading Mahomedans and Hindoos can and do render inestimable service to the Government by restraining the fanatical impulses of their extreme fellow-religionists. We heartily wish that the powerful Mahomedan community in India could bring its influence to bear in Turkey on behalf of a more liberal treatment there of non-Mahomedan communities. It is possible that they could, were they to move actively in the matter, do more to alleviate the conditions which militate so disastrously against the internal strength and external influence of the Central Mahomedan Power, that can be achieved by the diplomacy of the Christian nations, and would thus contribute immensely to allay the friction which is ever existing and is perilous to the best interests of the Mahomedan world.

(To the Editor of THE OVERLAND MAIL.)

DEAR SIR,---It is a far cry from Calcutta to London, but the inventions of modern civilisation have annihilated distance and made familiar neighbours of peoples who otherwise would not have heard of each other's names for months and years. When last year H. F. the Turkish Ambassador in France felt it his duty to protest against the representation in Paris of a French play, founded on the Life of the Holy Prophet Mahomed, on the ground that such an exhibition was an outrage on Mahomedan feeling, his action forthwith came to the knowledge of the Mahomedans of all parts of the world through the medium of the telegraph and the press, and commanded their general approbation. The hesitation of the French Government in giving effect to this reasonable protest, in fact their apparent disregard of it in the first instance, produced such a ferment in remote India that as a token of their abhorrence for the act of the French dramatist, the theatres in Bombay (the only place in India where any large number of Mahomedans resort to theatres) were boycotted by them and all connection with the drama in any capacity prohibited to Mahomedans. Now that the protest of the Turkish Ambassador has been finally accepted as just, and the representation of "The Prophet" prohibited on any French stage, the news has been received with the greatest satisfaction by all Mahomedan communities including among them the Mahomedan community in India which numbers 50 millions.

In connection with this incident I may be allowed to inform your readers, who are to be found in all parts of the world and among all communities, that in 1886 a very similar contretemps occurred in this city, the capital of British India. A Hindoo writer composed and published a drama under the name of "The Religious Hero Mahomed," in which the Holy Prophet, his venerable companions, and several ladies of the Holy Family figured among the dramatis personæ. Close upon the heels of the publication came the announcement that the play was to be produced on the boards of one of the Hindoo theatres of the metropolis.

On certain Mahomedan residents representing to the chief Police authority that such an exhibition would give grave offence to the feelings of the Mahomedan community, that officer took prompt steps to prohibit the performance.

As regards the suppression of the book itself, the Police possessed no such summary powers. A prosecution would have only given wider publicity to the book sought to be suppressed, and inflamed religious passions on either side. Under such circumstances I advised the publisher, a Hindoo gentleman, to take into his serious consideration the objections which the Mahomedans had to the book in question. I am happy to say that my friendly advice was acted upon, and the book voluntarily suppressed by the publisher. The stock in hand was made over to me for destruction, and the publisher promised to do his best to get back the few copies which had been till then circulated---a promise which was honourably fulfilled.

I trust this narrative will be interesting to your readers, as showing that the feeling which prompted the Turkish Ambassador's protest is one not confined to the Mahomedans in Europe, but is one fully shared in by the vast Islamic community in India, and the great importance of avoiding all semblance of offence to such religious sentiments. No wise Government would wantonly wound them.

I enclose extracts from the Indian papers in corroboration of my statements.---Yours sincerely,

ABDOOL LUTEEF.

Calcutta, May 13, 1890.

A MAHOMEDAN GRIEVANCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Englishman.

SIR,---A small dramatic work in Bengali named the "Dhormo Deer Mahomed," or the "Religious Hero Mahomed" has been recently printed and published by one Otool Krishna Mitter, at No. 97, Doorga Churn Mitter's Street, in Calcutta.

It purports to give an account of the doings of our Holy Prophet, and the Dramatis Personæ include himself, his venerable companions, and several ladies of his highly revered family.

As soon as I came to know of the publication of this work, and read portions of it, I concluded that the sale of such a book---the contents of which are outrageous and offensive to the feelings of the entire Mahomedan community---should be stopped at once, and the book itself entirely suppressed.

With this view I forthwith wrote to Baboo Gooroo Dass Chatterji, the proprietor of the bookshop called the Bengal Medical Library, at No. 201, Cornwallis Street, where the book was sold, pointing out to him the highly objectionable nature of the contents of the book, and advising him at once to put a stop to its further sale, as well as to call back all such copies as had already been sold by him.

In the meantime, it appearing from a paragraph in the local columns of the Englishman of Monday last, that the drama in question was about to be placed on the boards of some Native theatre in Calcutta, a number of Mahomedan gentlemen presented a petition to the Deputy Commissioner of Police protesting against the play being put on the stage, and requesting him to prevent the managers of that theatre from doing so. The Deputy Commissioner, I am glad to say, took prompt measures to prevent the outrage being committed, with the desired effect.

Baboo Gooroo Das Chatterjee has had the good sense of accepting my advice, and has forwarded to me 1,729 copies of the book (all that he had in his stock), and given me permission to destroy the same. He has, moreover, taken steps to recall all such copies that had already been sold, the number of which he assures me is small; and he has promised to place them in my hands as soon as he gets them back.

I will take an early opportunity of destroying the copies of the book in the presence of some of the leaders of Mahomedan Society.

The publication of this most offensive play and an attempt to have it acted on the theatre have created a great sensation among the Mahomedan residents of the town; and it is highly desirable in the interests of common good-will and peace that the leading members of the Hindu community should come forward and suppress the circulation of this book, and also of similar other books, one of which, having been put on the stage by the members of the Brahmo Somaj at Dacca, about a month ago, was about to create a serious disturbance between the Hindu and Mahomedan inhabitants of that city.

You will, Sir, place the Mahomedan community under an obligation by giving an early insertion to this letter in your widely circulated journal.

ABDOOL LUTEEF.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY

TO THE POINT.

THE day of tumult, strife, defeat, was o'er.
Worn out with toil, and noise, and scorn, and spleen,
I slumbered, and in slumber saw once more
A room in an old mansion, long unseen.

That room, methought, was curtained from the light ;
Yet through the curtains shone the moon's cold ray Full on a cradle, where, in linen white,
Sleeping life's first soft sleep, an infant lay.

* * * *

And lo ! the fairy queens who rule our birth
Drew nigh to speak the new-born baby's doom :
With noiseless steps, which left no trace on earth,
From gloom they came, and vanished into gloom.

Not deigning on the boy a glance to cast,
Swept careless by the gorgeous Queen of Gain,
More scornful still, the Queen of Fashion passed,
With mincing gait and sneer of cold disdain.

The Queen of Power tossed high her jewelled head,
And o'er her shoulder threw a wrathful frown.
The Queen of Pleasure on the pillow shed
Scarce one stray rose-leaf from her fragrant crown.

Still fay in long procession followed fay ;
And still the little couch remained unblest ;
But, when those wayward sprites had passed away,
Came one, the last, the mightiest, and the best.

Oh ! glorious lady, with the eyes of light,
And laurels clustering round thy lofty brow,
Who by the cradle's side didst watch that night,
Warbling a sweet strange music, who wast thou ?

" Yes, darling ; let them go," so ran the strain :
" Yes ; let them go, gain, fashion, pleasure, power,
And all the busy elves to whose domain
Belongs the nether sphere, the fleeting hour.

" Without one envious sigh, one anxious scheme,
The nether sphere, the fleeting hour resign.
Mine is the world of thought, the world of dream,
Mine all the past, and all the future mine.

* * * *

" Of the fair brotherhood who share my grace,
I, from thy natal day, pronounce thee free ;
And, if for some I keep a nobler place,
I keep for none a happier than for thee.

" There are who, while to vulgar eyes they seem
Of all my bounties largely to partake,
Of me as of some rival's handmaid deem,
And court me but for gain's, power's, fashion's, sake.

" To such, though deep their lore, though wide their fame,
Shall my great mysteries be all unknown ;
But thou, through good and evil, praise and blame,
Will not thou love me for myself alone ?

" Yes ; thou wilt love me with exceeding love,
And I will tenfold all that love repay ;
Still smiling, though the tender may reprove,
Still faithful, though the trusted may betray.

* * * *

" In the dark hour of shame, I deigned to stand
Before the frowning peers at Bacon's side ;
On a far shore I smoothed with tender hand,
Through months of pain, the sleepless bed of Hyde.

" I brought the wise and brave of ancient days
To cheer the cell where Raleigh pined alone ;
I lighted Milton's darkness with the blaze
Of the bright ranks that guard the eternal throne.

" And even so, my child, it is my pleasure
That thou not alone shouldst feel me nigh,
When in domestic bliss and studious leisure,
Thy weeks uncounted come, uncounted fly.

* * * *

" No ; when on restless night dawns cheerless morrow,
When weary soul and wasting body pine,
Thine am I still, in danger, sickness, sorrow,
In conflict, obloquy, want, exile, thine ;

" Thine, where on mountain waves the snowbirds scream,
Where more than Thule's winter barbs the breeze,
Where scarce, through lowering clouds, on sickly gleam
Lights the drear May-day of Antarctic seas ;

" Thine, when around thy litter's track all day
White sandhills shall reflect the blinding glare ;
Thine, when through forests breathing death, thy way
All night shall wind by many a tiger's lair ;

" Thine most, when friends turn pale, when traitors fly,
When, hard beset, thy spirit, justly proud,
For truth, peace, freedom, mercy, dares defy
A sullen priesthood and a raving crowd.

" Amidst the din of all things fell and vile,
Hate's yell, and envy's hiss, and folly's bray,
Remember me ; and with an unforced smile
See riches, baubles, flatterers, pass away.

IN September 1888, the Government of India, in the Home Department, offered a reward of Rs. 1,000 for the best text-book on Domestic Economy and Sanitary Science for the use, of the senior classes of English and Anglo-Vernacular Schools in India. In August of the following year, a committee consisting of the Principal, Medical College, Lahore, Surgeon-Major A. Stephen, Sanitary Commissioner, Punjab, and Honorary Surgeon Rahim Khan, Khan Bahadur, Lecturer on Materia Medica and Medicine, Lahore Medical College, were appointed to adjudge the prize. Eighteen candidates competed, the best essays being those of Surgeon A. E. Roberts, of the Indian Medical Service, and Surgeon R. H. Firth, Army Medical Department. The Committee further consider that the essay of Surgeon Roberts "is the more suitable for adoption as a text-book," and the Governor-General in Council has, accordingly, sanctioned the Rs. 1,000 for the Surgeon of the Indian Medical Service.

THE Council of the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce approve of the recent Memorial by the Bengal Chamber against the levy in India of Income Tax on Consignments, and have resolved—that a Memorial be forwarded to the Viceroy of India supporting the Memorial of the Bengal Chamber.

WE read—

"Five hundred thousand visiting-cards have been engraved in Washington this season, says the Paper World. One stationery firm has turned out 300,000 in the last two months, and the money spent on paste-board during a season amounts to tens of thousands of dollars. The most ordinary card costs a cent a piece after the plate is made, and some of the dinner invitations sent but cost 10 dols. a dozen. A prominent item on the expense account of a Washington belle is her engraving and printing, and society ladies who give dinners spend at times hundreds of dollars upon the stationery for a feast. Mrs. Leland Stanford lately paid 85 dols. for fifty cards to be used as menus for one of her big dinners. The map of the United States was stamped in silver on the cards, and the drawing and engraving were exquisite. At the dinner which General Breckinridge gave, the cards cost 1 dol. a piece, and Mrs. Justice Blanchford gave not long ago a luncheon, the cards for which were carved by hand at a cost of 18 dols. a dozen. Some of the cards are in raised silver and gold. They look as though the gold and silver had been melted and poured into letters on the cards, and cost 75 cents a piece."

We hope collectors will not allow these specimens of dinner stationery to disperse and be lost. Presented together they would give a good idea of the wealth and refinement of the times. Sumptuous stationery is not unknown in the East. At the princely dinner given in behalf of the community by Raja Inder Chunder Singh, at his residence in Russell Street, to Mons. Jules Joubert, the maker of the Calcutta Exhibition, one of the guests who had been a well-known journalist in England, was profuse in admiration of the menu, confessing, with post-prandium openness and fervour that he had never seen the like of it.

THE recent fall of houses in Bombay has awakened the Municipal Standing Committee to the necessity of proper building regulations. The Municipal Commissioner has accordingly been requested to favor the Committee with a report as to the measures adopted to give practical effect to the building regulations in the Municipal Act (III of 1888) as regards new buildings in course of erection, as also to submit draft building byelaws for the erection of safe buildings and for competent and vigilant inspection with a view to their stability while in course of erection. Why should not the existing houses, that is, houses after they have been built, specially all public places, be subjected to periodical inspection with a view to their stability as also their sanitation? Here is a hint for all municipalities.

THE defences of the Hyderabad Residency are to be improved. Orders have also been passed for removal of the treasure to Trimulgherry entrenchment. The costs have been estimated at Rs. 80,000.

THE Jubilee Plunger, Ernest Benzon, has plunged himself into debt. He is now passing through the court. His liabilities are given at £38,000 and assets at £13,000.

THE Second Half-yearly Departmental Examination of 1890 of Assistant and Deputy Magistrates in the regulation and non-regulation districts, and of officers in the Police, Medical, Forest and Opium Departments, will begin on Monday, the 6th October next.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has countermanded the tolls at Simoriah for that portion of the Arrah Canal which lies between Lock No. 12 in village Baghamath and Lock No. 13 on the river Ganges at Akona, both in the district of Shahabad.

THE next Entrance Examination has been fixed for Monday, the 2nd February 1891, the F. A. and B. A. Examinations will come off a fortnight later on the 16th February, and the B. L. begins on the 2nd March 1891.

LADY Lansdowne arrived at Bombay in the morning of the 18th and in the evening left for England. There were many persons present at the Apollo Bunder to witness the embarkation. Previous to her departure from Simla, she held, on the 8th instant, a Reception which was numerously attended.

SIR Steuart Bayley arrived at Calcutta on the 11th. There was a Durbar at Belvedere on the 15th, when the following recipients were invested with their newly acquired titles :—

"Maharaja Sir Jotendro Mohun Tagore, Bahadur, K.C.S.I., of Calcutta; Maharaja Mohendro Deo Saont, of Athmulik; Raja Jyoti Prosad Gorga, of Maisadul, in Midnapur; Mahamahopadhyaya Ayodhya Nath Miser Samavedi, of Pota, in Mozufferpur; Mahamahopadhyaya Krishna Singh Takur, of Bhoar, in Tirhut; Mahamahopadhyaya Kanhai Lal Jha, of Mangraumi, in Durbhunga; Shams-ul-Ulama Maulavi Abdur Rauf, of Patna; Maulavi Ahmad, Khan Bahadur, of Calcutta; Rai Mata Din, Bahadur, of Patna; Rai Nundo Kishore Das, Bahadur, Assistant Superintendent of the Tributary Mehals, Orissa; Rai Kali Podo Mookerjee, Bahadur, Personal Assistant to the Commissioner of Orissa; and Rai Nalinaksha Bose, Bahadur, of Burdwan."

The usual ceremonies were gone through, the Lieutenant-Governor being profuse in his admiration of the qualities and services which, in their ready recognition by the members and agents of an appreciative Government, had secured them the honors.

THE East Indian Railway Company having refused to pay municipal taxes to the Hooghly and Chinsurah Municipality, the Government of India was moved to enable the Municipal Commissioners to levy taxes on the Railway line under the Indian Railway Act, 1890, or to exclude the Grand Trunk Road from Municipal limits. Pending further orders, the Railway Authorities have been ordered to pay taxes from and after 1st May 1890.

UNDER the Indian Ports Act (X of 1889), the Lieutenant-Governor has ruled that

"1. On the occurrence of a case of cholera, small-pox, or other dangerously communicable disease on board any ship lying in the port, the master shall, as early as possible, send the affected person to hospital, and shall cause the flag R to be hoisted at the fore as a signal to the Health Officer of the Port, and such signal shall not be lowered until the Health Officer has visited the ship.

2. The master shall afford such information in regard to the occurrence of the disease as the Health Officer may require, and shall carry out such reasonable instructions regarding the cleansing and disinfection of the vessel, and the disposal of polluted clothing, bedding, &c., as that officer may consider it necessary to give.

3. If, by reason of the prevalence of any dangerously communicable disease on board any ship, the Health Officer and one other medical officer in the service of the Government at Calcutta jointly consider it absolutely necessary for the safety of the crews of other vessels that such vessel should be segregated, the Health Officer shall furnish the master with a certificate to that effect. The master shall, on receipt of such certificate, forthwith give notice accordingly to the Harbour Master, and the vessel shall be removed to Mateabrooj, or such other place as the Port Commissioners may direct.

4. On the occurrence of a death on board, the master shall, without delay, inform the River Police, whose permission shall be obtained before the corpse is removed."

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE relations between the British Government and the United States appear to be strained over the Behring Sea Fishery question.

The English Government have resolved to demand increased military contributions from the Crown Colonies. The House of Lords has passed a Bill for increased barrack accommodation.

The American House of Representatives has passed the Silver Bill in entirety by a Republican majority. President Harrison's signature to the Bill has been affixed. It will have effect from the 13th August.

The British House of Lords has passed the Bill sanctioning the Anglo-German Agreement.

In opening the new Rifle Ranges of the National Rifle Association at Besley Common which for the future will replace Wimbledon, the Prince of Wales made a patriotic speech. His Royal Highness appealed to the nation to support the Association, the object of which was to make the rifle what the bow was in the days of the Plantagenets.

There is a change of Ministry in Cape Colony on account of the rejection by the Cape Parliament of a large Railway scheme.

Lord Rosebery has resigned the Chairmanship of the County Council.

The Madhi is again on the war path. He is reported to have suffered a reverse with the loss of his head-quarters at El Obeid.

AFTER his chequered career of adventure in the Dark Continent, Mr. Stanley's life on return to England enters on another phase. He has married. The ceremony was brilliant, and there were enthusiastic demonstrations outside Westminster Abbey by large crowds of people who had collected to give the pair a reception. The Queen has presented Mr. Stanley with a miniature portrait of herself set in diamonds with a letter eulogising his services and wishing him wedded happiness.

The Queen has given fifty pounds towards Stanley's steamer for the Nyanza.

Sir John Kirk is made a Commander of the Bath for his services on the Anti-Slavery Conference of the Powers to consider the best means of stopping the Slave Trade by sea and land.

STRIKES are the order of the day "at Home" and abroad. One or two are always on the hands of the authorities. The London postmen's strike has, however, past the crisis. The dock laborers have also resumed work.

The Madrid strikers are more than usually turbulent. Troops had to be called out to quell the riots. They opened fire, killing and wounding many.

Nitrate workers are on strike at Chili, Monroe country. They were fired on by troops and forty killed.

A SEVERE thunderstorm accompanied by torrential rains took place in London and the provinces, causing heavy floods.

A terrific cyclone swept over Minnesota and Wisconsin, wrecking a steamer and several boats, causing damage to the value of millions of dollars and killing two hundred lives.

A terrible fire took place at Constantinople, destroying a timber yard and nine hundred houses and shops. The loss is estimated at one million sterling.

A LUNATIC, apparently eaten up by a passion for notoriety, fired a revolver at President Carnot and was immediately arrested. The revolver was charged with blank cartridges.

CONFLICTING telegrams have reached this country as to the prospects of Lord Cross's Bill. In one, it is said that it will be abandoned on account of the opposition which is being organised against it. A later announcement is of a more hopeful kind. It is said that Mr. Smith hopes that the Bill may even yet pass in this Session. The outlook, however, is not very promising. Here is an offer of reform from the British Government in response to the demand from this country, and the Congress party reject it on the ground that it is not enough. What alone will make the offer acceptable to this party is the concession of election, and they will wait and agitate for years till election is given, rather than have the other concessions without it. Election may be, and is, a good thing, but the idolatrous admiration of it, manifested by some of the Congress leaders, is something very curious. Already people with experience of its trial in the country are getting disenchanted of it. If Sir Henry Harrison were asked, he would probably say he had had enough of it. But enough is not always as good as a feast, we are afraid.

THIS is a remarkably good year for native candidates at the London Civil Service competition. No less than five have passed, three of them being Hindus of Bengal, one a Mahomedan of Behar, and one a Parsee. This is highly gratifying from more than one point of view. The number satisfactory as in itself it is, is more so from its geographical and ethnic distribution. We congratulate Bombay and our Mahomedan fellow-countrymen on their sharing in the rewards that have fallen to India. To us of Bengal, and of Reis and Rayyet in particular, the patriotic exaltation, not to say exultation, with which we have received the telegraphic announcement of so many of our countrymen, of all parts and different sections of the community, having passed the Rubicon and being fairly on the march to the Imperial Rome of high office, is heightened by the sympathy of blood and kinship and personal friendship. The successful candidates are Mr. Satis Chandra Mookerjee, a relative of our friend Mr. P. L. Roy, Barrister-at-law (of the Roys of Lakutia), Mr. Arabenda Ghose, son of another friend, Dr. K. D. Ghose (the wellknown sanitationist), Mr. Mohinimohun Ghose, son of yet another friend, if we may be permitted to call him so, Mr. Monomohun Ghose (the wellknown advocate), Mr. Yusuff, of Bankipore, and Mr. Mudgarkar, who stands third among the five, of Bombay.

Considering the high standard of intellectual qualifications required for a proper discharge of the duties of higher administrative posts, and the more and more exacting and complicated character of their work, it must always be a far more desirable thing to make one's way to those posts by means of competition than otherwise. If the conditions of that competition have not so far been quite advantageous to native candidates, it is all the more to the credit of this year's batch that they have succeeded in spite of them. It is to be hoped that the limitation of age as regards Indian competitors will be removed, or at any rate farther extended, in the future, instead of making the exceptional result of this year an argument for its retention.

THE Chief Commissioner of Assam has shown a courage worthy of his exalted office. In his Resolution on the Assam Police Report for the past year, he has hit on a serious blot in administration, which is by no means confined to his frontier Province. Mr. Quinton reveals the true secret of the large number of false cases shewn in the return. They are not all really false, but are shewn to be such to cover the failure of the Police to bring the offenders to justice. These and other delinquencies of the Police are to be attributed to the system of returns, which are the established basis of recognition of good service and promotion. In the Judicial Service itself, specially the Subordinate or Uncovenanted Judiciary in which our countrymen are chiefly employed, the effect of the blind adherence to tabular results is visible. When will our Government learn to see the futility of mere forms?

AN embezzlement of Rs. 895-6-6 by a collecting Sircar has been detected in the North Barrackpore Municipality. The accounts of that Municipality seem to be in an unsatisfactory state. The Commissioner of the Presidency Division has been asked to call for a full report from the Municipality explaining what steps have been taken to realise the amount embezzled, as well as to bring the offender to justice. The Municipality is also required to explain why the accounts have not been kept in the prescribed form and no security taken from the offender. And what about the Government audit? Does not a state accountant travel through the country inspecting the books and examining the accounts of Municipalities, sumptuously billeted on the municipal accountants? Is the inspecting and examining all a formality without substance—mere "eye-wash"—a putting a good face upon an unsightly matter? The billeting is very real, and not unoften substantial. The auditing, we are afraid, is a farce, and practically smooths the path and strengthens the hands of peculation.

It has been detected that the names of dead holders of Carnatic Stipends continue on the list of pensioners, and stipends are drawn in their names. This is a common form of fraud. It prevails in connection with political pensions at all Agencies. It is encouraged by the Purda system—the custom which veils our ladies from observation.

A MONSTER suit involving well-known political characters, though itself of little political interest, is pending in the Punjab. It is a monstrous litigation, between mother and son and mother and grandsons. The plaintiff is Lady Gujri, widow of Dewan Jwala Sáhái, the famous comrade and Chief Minister of Maharaja Golab Singh. Jwala Sáhái left two sons, the late Dewan Kirparam and Dewan Lachman Das. Kirparam left two sons, Anantram and Amarnath. The Dowager Lady Gujri now sues Dewan Lachman Das, ex-Prime Minister of Cashmere, and his nephews, Dewans Anantram and Amarnath, for possession of immovable property valued at 15 lacs. She claims the property, situated in Cashmere, Gujranwala, Sialkot, Lahore and Jammu, as a gift to her under the will of her husband. The suit has been filed in the civil court of Gujranwala. Messrs. Rattigan and Higgins represent the plaintiff, while Mr. P. C. Chatterjee and Lalā Gobind Ram defend the suit. The case will be taken up on the 15th November next, when the Subordinate Judge goes to Aminabad to examine the plaintiff.

HERE is a side issue in the Jain Defamation case, pending in the Court of the Northern Division Magistrate, in which Indra Chund Nahatta prosecutes fourteen of his community, for publishing and abetting the publication of a pamphlet in which it is stated that he had been excommunicated for visiting Europe and eating prohibited food at a Bombay hotel, on boardship and at several hotels in England:—

"At the Calcutta High Court on the 8th July, before Justices Norris and Gordon, Mr. Dunne applied to have the record sent for of a recent application to the Chief Presidency Magistrate for a summons against the leading men of the Jain community, and to have them bound down to keep the peace.

Mr. Dunne explained that the applicant, Indra Chund Nahatta, was a rich and influential member of the Jain community, who had incurred the disfavour of some other members by visiting Europe. He went to the Jain temple on the 1st July, when a crowd of Jains rose and attempted to prevent him entering. He did enter however: and when he left they hooted him out of the place. Four leading men went to the police afterwards, and said openly that if the applicant visited the temple again there would be bloodshed. The applicant went to the Commissioner of Police, who stationed a police force near the temple and suggested that the offenders should be bound down to keep the peace. The Magistrate, when appealed to, advised the applicant not to go to the temple if the people objected to his presence. Counsel submitted that applicant had a right to visit the temple, and it was the Magistrate's duty to protect him in the exercise of his right.

Mr. Justice Norris asked if it was quite certain that a Jain who had transgressed the rules of the community and broken his caste had the right.

Mr. Dunne claimed his client had a right to prove he had not forfeited his caste rights.

Mr. Justice Norris did not think it likely there would be any crime. There was all the more reason, being a religious question, why no secular tribunal should try it.

After much argument Mr. Justice Norris said the bench were of opinion that there was not sufficient ground to interfere with the exercise of the Magistrate's discretion."

The main case stands adjourned to the 24th.

WHAT is the domicile of the Maharaja Duleep Sing or of his son Prince Albert V. Duleep? The question was raised in the Court of Appeal in England, and the Master of the Rolls, the Lord Justice Lindly Topey concurring, thus put and answered the question :—

"Did the Maharaja choose a domicile in England? Did he ever give up his domicile in the Punjab and intend not to return there? Looking at all the facts, there could be no doubt that the true inference was that the Maharaja as soon as he had a will of his own, always intended to return to the Punjab whenever he could do so. In his opinion therefore the Maharaja never acquired a domicile in England, but retained his domicile in the Punjab. The son therefore also took the domicile in the Punjab as long as he was under age. But even assuming that the Maharaja abandoned his domicile in the Punjab, and chose an English one still the Maharaja before his son came of age abandoned his English domicile and reverted back to his domicile of origin in the Punjab, and his son being under age took the domicile of the father. In either case at the moment before the son came of age he had not a domicile in England. The petitioning creditor must show the abandonment by the son when he came of age of the domicile which he had the moment before he came of age, and the election of an English domicile. The burden of proving an English domicile lay upon the petitioning creditor. The son's living in England for a few months with his mother after he came of age was no evidence of a choice of domicile in England, nor did the fact of his entering the army, though it might be some evidence, help the case much."

This wandering Jew of a poor Indian Prince, deprived in childhood of the religion of his birth, expatriated in boyhood, and then denationalised by the very conditions of his existence for life among strangers in an alien land, and finally beggared and disgraced, until he lost his head, has alas! no domicile. Neither country nor home remains for him.

THE world has heard enough of Baboo English and of that chef d'œuvre of Baboo Literature, the Memoir of the late Mr. Justice Onoocool Chunder Mookerjee by his nephew. Only the other day, the London Globe entertained its readers with "The Beauties of Baboo English." As a rule, however, these "caterers" to the innocent mirth of our European fellow-subjects, here or at Home, simply invent philological absurdities and verbal combinations of the strangest, and pass them off on a gullible public as the exercises of Indians and the outcome of half a century's efforts to impart English education to the Indian people. In point of fact, the so-called "specimens" are no more Baboo or Prabhu than Basque. The true "Baboo" is queer enough in all conscience, but it has a method in its madness—a distinct individuality. For the benefit of those who might desire to know what this Indian "Pidgin," in its literary development, is like, we quote the following account of the weather at Burwani, the capital of a small chief under the Central India Agency. It was sent to the Morning Post which in its thorough appreciation of it has printed it with all its beauties on its head. Here is it :—

"On 3rd instant (June) at 1 P.M. there was a heavy tempest of a dreadful wind, and it is followed by a downpour of a heavy rain. The great nalla, which flows through the heart of the town, came into heavy flood, so that, almost all the adjacent houses were for a long time in water, the poor dwellers were in great catastrophe and they were deeply drowned in the whirlpool of difficulties to escape from the threatening danger. Some wretched people took refuge in the highest and uppermost part of their houses, while others were obliged to seek themselves to the safest places by crossing the running streams, I am poured into the horrible imagination and sorry still to give a most terrible account of a poor and a most wretched pair of fakir, who was flowed to the distance of quarter of a mile in the said nallah but fortunately caught by the trees and thus they have saved their lives. Many houses fell down and a number of living stocks died of drowning. In short, the people of Barwani greatly suffered in this stormy tempest. Total loss estimated that night was more than Rs. 2,000."

Well might our contemporary call it a "touching letter!"

THE following letter, which appears in the English Press, corrects a misrepresentation, but we are glad that the occasion has recalled to the civilised world the services of the pioneer in our days of African discovery, which has at last culminated in the latest successful adventure of Stanley, the Hero of the hour :—

"Sir,—My relations have startled me with a paragraph from a 'London correspondent' saying that 'Sir Richard Burton is lying very dangerously ill, neglected, and alone, in a London lodging, whilst Stanley is being feted.' If the love and devotion of a wife may count for anything, Sir Richard will never be neglected nor alone whilst I am alive. I have been married to him for nearly thirty years, besides a five years' engagement, and during all those thirty-five years, I have never been absent from him one day that I was allowed to be with him—in other words, I have never been absent except to execute his orders. For the last seven years we have hardly been a day apart, and for the last three and a-half years that he has been ailing, never one hour away out of the twenty four. During these three and a-half years we have, in consequence of the weakness of health, sacrificed everything to have a resident English doctor (who was looking for such a berth) living and travelling with us. And instead of a London lodging we have a beautiful and romantic home (with every comfort for him that our means allow) at the very head of the Adriatic. Next year his term of service expires (forty-nine years' actual service), and then we shall both be, if alive, 'in a London lodging neglected and alone.' But to state that now is what the Americans would call 'a little previous.' On the other hand, I am very grateful to the correspondent for the truth of his statement about my husband's career, showing that in the midst of this feting and rejoicings for the great traveller Stanley, the pioneer who opened up the way without money or help or applause, enduring the severest hardships and perils, and cold receptions of his return, is not forgotten at home and that they know that it is to him first that they owe the fact that many of these desolate regions have now trade and schools and missions, and the beginning of civilisation. I feel confident that God will make up to him more than he has missed of this world's honours.—Yours, &c., Isabel Burton.—Trieste, June 15."

That expression of dutiful devotion comes specially home to our Hindu heart. It looks so like the expression of a Hindu wife. The truth is, the ideal wife, as the ideal husband, is the same in every community. Lady Burton is an accomplished woman who has made contributions of merit to literature. Yet she is

A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food.

HERE are two chips of the same block alike with a marvellous exactitude!—the same in body, mind, external relations, and all circumstances—in everything!

"There are two young artisans of Bristol, named Johnson, who are twins. They are not only of the same height, having the same coloured hair, eyes, and complexion, identical physical measurements, and feeding, walking, running, laughing, crying, singing, and speaking alike, but they are of the same occupation, hold the same position, and have the same religious persuasion and likes and dislikes. More singular still, they have espoused very similar wives, and they have the same number of children, who are of the same sexes, three girls and three boys each."

The two sets of children are of the same age and otherwise similar as their mothers, we suppose?

A brace of brothers alike to a t—here are elements of a pretty mess, by either and both, and by others! The fun is obvious, but there is danger in the situation. The ever-recurring Comedy of Errors of such an equivocal ambiguous existence must be too much of a good thing. But there are possibilities of the Comedy culminating in frightful Tragedies of Errors. It must be bad enough to be assaulted or accused in mistake, or arrested and sent to jail for another. We only hope the poor fellows are sure of their own wives and children, and that the wives are able to make a tolerable guess as to their lords, and that the sons and daughters know their fathers and mothers.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1890.

THE HOLIDAYS—IN A FIX.

TIME was when our Rulers sympathised with the festivities of the people. Those sympathies are now dying out, and man must reduce himself to a machine to keep pace with the age. To a thoroughly religious and sociable people like the Hindus, holidays come as a matter of course. But religious or social usages must give way before the exigencies of business. So the fiat has gone forth and holidays must be retrenched.

The reduction of holidays is a fait accompli. The Government offices with the exception of a few are indeed untouched. It is proposed to curtail the number of holidays, under the Negotiable Instruments Act, the days so curtailed being allowed to clerks in Government offices by executive order. This is a half and half measure which cannot be final. At any rate, the principle on which the holiday question has hitherto been treated is departed from, and the question must continue to drift along at the mercy of every periodical agitation for further restriction of the holidays. The merchants have gained their point, and the weaker side, as always, gone to the wall. When Sir Stuart Bayley allowed the question to be reopened after it had been once set at rest, we felt what it augured, and prepared ourselves for the worst. But as regards the community at large, they stoutly held out hopefully against the possibility of a time honored privilege being at length withdrawn. To the nation in general, the decision of the Government will cause the keenest disappointment. Their attitude of hope and anxiety and suspense during the pendency of the question must be realized if one will gauge the deep popular attachment to the holidays. The holidays are to them among their dearest possession. To those in private service, the holidays were the only point in which they could cheerfully compare their lot with their more favored brethren in the Government service. With nothing else in common, here they met on equal ground. Without the prospect of pension or the advantages of a liberally framed scale of pay or Leave Code—with hardly any privilege leave in fact, private servants had yet their Doorga Pooja holidays to look forward to, and this went a great way to reconcile them to their circumstances. It may be all very well for the mercantile community to say now, that every reasonable consideration will be made to Hindu clerks in regard to their allowance on holidays, or that compensation will be granted in the shape of holidays at other times. But in the course of time, when the change has already established itself and the present feeling has passed away, these kind intentions will hardly be remembered. At any rate, excepting in the most respectable mercantile establishments of long standing, such considerate treatment of servants has never been shown, and never will be.

The present reduction of the holidays will surely prove the thin end of the wedge introduced into the religious customs and usages of the Hindus. By and by they will lose their popular character, thereby furnishing at some future time another argument for sweeping away the holidays altogether. Like a noble animal in the story books, Pundit Mahes Chunder Nayaratna little knows the mischief he has done. He has dealt the death blow to the religious life among Hindus. The mercantile community too regards the present decision of the Government as but a part fulfilment of the programme it has been fighting for. The Bank of Bengal in so many words declares that it accepts the present proposals of the Government as "an instalment only for the time being," and encouraged by one success, the representatives of commerce are not likely to rest till the remnant of the holidays shrinks to next to nothing.

The European merchants have succeeded not by dint of persistence only. Their influence and position have at last told. They have been at this business from a long time past, without effect. They have knocked and knocked in hope it will be opened unto them. It had not been opened. The history of the holiday question is a record of their persevering energy. It was so far back as 1860 that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce first made the proposal which has now been accepted by the Government, viz., to reduce the holidays to the number required for the ceremonial observances of the Hindu religion. This led to the appointment of a Committee which recommended some reduction. The Local Government accepted the Committee's recommendation, but it was set aside by the Government of India, and 27 days, including 12 days for the Doorga and Lucki Poojas, were declared as public holidays. By a subsequent order of the Government of India dated 29th October 1867, the number of days was raised to 30, and this has been the number of public holidays up to the present time. During this repeated efforts were made by the European mercantile community for curtailing the number thus fixed. Different proposals were made, some for summarily reducing holidays in all offices, and others for reducing them as regards only the Bank of Bengal, and the Currency and Pay offices in the Presidency, the other Government offices being wholly or partially closed, at the discretion of Heads of Departments, and with due regard to the discharge of current work. The conduct of both the Local and Supreme Governments in view of these various proposals has all along been fluctuating and uncertain. Sometimes the Local Government has shown more firmness than the Supreme Government, while at other times it was the Supreme Government that supplied any deficiency of that quality in the Local Government. Call it firmness or call it what you will, but the mercantile demand has been resisted in spite of an evident disposition to favor it. It was a sore trial to these Governments and the trial came with the regularity of the Pooja season. Opposite principles and feelings contended for mastery, but so far the holidays have always won. There was, indeed, weakness and an ill-concealed disposition to meet the desire of the merchants sometimes with one Government and sometimes with another. Amusing situations sometimes occurred. On one occasion the Government of India passed orders for curtailing the holidays, only to cancel them immediately afterwards. In the midst of all these fluctuations, however, one principle has been clearly admitted, viz., that if the holidays were to be maintained, it was to be on religious grounds. The latest decision of the Government of India, when the question was thoroughly considered and as we then understood finally set at rest, was expressed in a deliberate manner. It was said "that the inconvenience and loss which the mercantile community suffer from the existing state of things, great and serious as they are, cannot be remedied without inflicting a still more serious hardship on a far more numerous, though less influential, portion of the community." The question was thus finally disposed of, and while the allegations of the loss to trade were admitted, this ground was not held sufficient strength to justify a departure from the principle of accommodating the religious and social requirements of the Hindus on which the holidays were from the first based. But this old principle is now abandoned. It is now held, on the authority of a Government Pundit in pyjamas, that several of the holidays are not required for religious purposes.

MR. JAMES ROUTLEDGE TO YOUNG INDIA IN ENGLAND.

It does one's heart good to listen to Mr. Routledge. His words come straight from the heart—and what a great heart is his—the present generation in India who followed his career as editor of the Friend of India need not be told. Talking ever so long, he can never be betrayed into a false note. Everything is genuine about him—all his utterances are clear, deliberate, and manly. His style takes its character from his thoughts—plain, clear and masculine. A lecture on "Young India" at a meeting of the National Indian Association from such a man, can scarcely fail to be of more than common interest. Sir Owen Tudor Burne, K.C.S.I., well known as the good Private Secretary of the lamented Lord Mayo, presided. The Association could not have found a brace of more sympathetic men than their lecturer and Chairman to take part in a congenial business.

Mr. Routledge's heart is true to India as ever. Speaking to Indians in England and on his congenial Indian topics, he is quite in his element—he finds full scope for the great and generous thoughts and feelings that lie deep in him. The lecture before us treats of a large variety of subjects, and the treatment is original, truthful and thoughtful. Mr. Routledge says or writes nothing except with a high aim. That aim is to impart true knowledge by dispelling errors, misconceptions, and prejudices, and to advance the cause of progress on just and noble principles. In the present tract there are proofs in every page of his earnest love of truth. There is no small conception, for instance, about the nature of the Sepoy Mutiny and, if in course of Mr. Routledge's remarks, he is even incidentally led to the subject, he is not the man to rest content without characterising it as "the military mutiny" and acknowledging "how England owed to India at the time." Constitutionally sincere and animated by a delicate regard for truth, he cannot open his discourse without telling the very fact as to the origin of the British dominion in India. The following passage has such an air of fresh and withal genial candour about it and is at once so patriotic without the usual sentimental cant on the subject, that we dare say it will be appreciated:—

"To say that the relations of India to England have no parallel in the history of mankind were to state a truism. Nothing at all like them ever was seen before. They are entirely original; yet no man or men can be said to have invented or designed them. Characterised by statesmanship and generalship of a remarkable order, they nevertheless bear the marks of a simple groping onward from one class of circumstances to another, till from some as dark nights as ever set on human affairs a morning of bright possibilities has dawned."

The extract is about the opening passage, but the whole tract bears repetition. A large variety of useful and instructive things is tersely and forcibly conveyed to his Indian auditory. To give them proper ideals of life and to disabuse them of any lurking selfish or sordid notions as to the end of knowledge or activity, Mr. Routledge places before them the noble examples of some poor men who have nevertheless done work for which humanity is their debtor for all time. No mere didactic discourse could possibly be of such effect as the noble doings and sufferings of men like Columbus, Captain Henry Hudson, John Wickliffe, William Tyndall, John Pounds and Roger Williams, the exiled of the Pilgrim Fathers. Indian students are rightly or wrongly accused of having an eye to worldly profit as the object of education. They are likely deficient in sustaining vigor and stamina in their pursuit of knowledge. Mr. Routledge could not have more delicately and at the same time effectively applied a corrective to these things than by holding up examples of men who placed the good of others above their own, and battled with adversity in the cause of knowledge or truth.

The tract bristles with sound and wise precepts, and we can recommend no better reading for the leisure of the rising generation of Indian students than these instructive pages. Mr. Routledge talks like a sage, but with what cheerful philosophy he views commonest incidents whose meaning is missed by ordinary observers, the following passage will show:—

"The history altogether is one of remarkable events. But perhaps among them all there is nothing more strange and suggestive than your own presence in England to-day; nothing more likely to take a place among the romances of history. There have been despots who called such facts into being, with a view to obtaining an influence with which humanity has no sympathy. Your presence in England is a totally different thing from that. It signifies your co-partnership—your comradeship—in a heritage of freedom; and, unless the signs of the times are misleading, eventually of empire. The will that brought you here was your own, or that of your friends; as also was the cost. There may be people who fancy that they have an interest in your not coming to England. There can be no interest in your being here unless it rests on public grounds. All the circumstances considered, there are few things more curious than this simple meeting, a few yards away from one of the great thoroughfares of London life."

Mr. Routledge's love for the Indian people makes him a warm admirer of British rulers who have sympathised with them. He speaks with patriotic pride of a few of the best men whom England has sent out to this country.

"I am not here to assert that Englishmen have always acted wisely, honourably, mercifully, in India. If such a statement were made you would be able to contradict it on the spot. You will not, however, contradict the statement that England has sent to India men of whom we all may be proud; men of sincere and upright aims and acts—eager to labour, not to win men to this or that opinion, or class of opinions, but to lighten the darkness, and increase the comforts of the masses of the people. Against the merely selfish persons we may set off men like Lord William Bentinck, Sir Charles Metcalfe, Havelock, Outram, the Lawrences, Lord Canning, and others equally noble, if not so well known; men who respected the old traditions and customs of your land; sympathised with its pleasures and festivities, and strove to protect the people against wrong-doers of whatever kind or name. Occasionally also a man of great capacity and decision of character, like General Ochterlony, has represented a bulwark against ruthless devastation."

The keen sympathies of Mr. Routledge with "the pleasures and festivities" of the people will never be forgotten by those who remember how sturdily he fought against the attempt, made some years ago by a set of puritanic officials, to disallow the car festival. But we have fallen on hard times. O for a Routledge now among the publicists in Bengal when the grandest Hindu festival is threatened!

THE STATUTORY CIVIL SERVICE.

One of the greatest blots in the proceedings of the Public Service Commission (as far as they have been published) is in the treatment of this subject of vital importance to the future of Indian administration. The want of if not due attention to this point, at least of proper handling of it, is manifest. There is nothing to show that the Commission had sifted the evidence of the innumerable witnesses they examined, or even selected the best witnesses competent to speak on the statutory system.

The wholesale condemnation of this interesting experiment is most extraordinary, and not at all creditable to the Commission.

The Statutory Service is the first notable recognition of Lord Canning's policy of drawing out the native aristocracy to the front, and encouraging them to take part in the administration of the country, instead of leaving the people at the mercy of the educated democracy, consisting of the class of the sons of men risen from the ministerial agency of our courts with a sprinkling of the educated Barristers.

In originally instituting the statutory civilian, it is to be feared the Government did not sufficiently restrict the selection for these appointments with due regard either to wealth, influence or the position their families held during the native rule, of the nominees. Many sycophants, or sons of favorite Klaerkhaas were appointed, who had not the slightest pretensions to aristocracy, and others of good families, but whose parents, being opposed to our radical system of education, i. e., the mixing of all classes in charity schools, were of course deficient, not only in knowledge of our court procedure, but even in knowledge of language, and thus the statutory civilian may be considered to have failed.

In this days most members of the good families not degenerated by poverty, have had fair scholastic education. If they were now appointed, say under a mild competition system, and on probation, they would not only give more satisfaction to Government, but would most certainly, from the resuscitation of their position, be considered equally as trustworthy as any European officer, and, moreover, from their superior knowledge of the language, their knowledge of the character, habits and customs of the people, would be more acceptable to them. It may even be asserted that in cases involving religious or caste prejudices, they would invariably be preferred to the European officer.

Under the present régime, constantly increasing the refinement of legislation, our Competitionwallah commences his practical service primed with the purest theories of refined English law of evidence, like, which no other country or system has reached such nicety of "how not to do it," and of criminal justice, with its leading principle of giving the prisoner the advantage of all possible doubt, as though the object was "how not to find conviction for any crime."

At home itself, what have been the results of your modern refinement and progress? Why, in order to gratify political animosities, an Opposition has so encouraged the commission of murder, bycotting, conspiracy and treason in every shape, under colour of constitutional means—that a Special Commission of judges is informed, without a particle of moral shame or fear, that a political lie uttered in Parliament for party purposes is venial, abetment of fraud, riot and even murder is justifiable under the specious plea of patriotism!

It must be remembered that high class education to a ten per cent. of the population, has resulted in a spirit of socialism throughout Europe, that in England this ten per cent. may be styled the lower section of the middle classes, who to magnify their proportions, importance and popularity, have taken to style themselves "the democracy," that their every act is autocratic, their principles based on the irresistibility of brute force. In England, there need at present be small fear, that the Saxon race, having raised themselves, on feudal principles and under a constitutional system, to their present high position in the political world, any opportunity will be lost by the masses, on every instance of affliction or happiness to Royalty, or to the aristocracy, widely and loudly to demonstrate their feelings of lively sympathy for a Constitutional monarchy in touch with the people and a nobility which, during more than eight hundred years, has led that people, doing and suffering in the cause of national existence and glory, and the cause of civil and religious liberty. Need we refer to the intense sympathy and feelings of loyalty throughout Great Britain (including even Ireland) during the sickness and death of our late Prince Consort, the sickness of our present Prince of Wales, Her Majesty's Jubilee, the deaths of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Beaconsfield—invariably most intense in London and the large manufacturing cities? None but those present could fully appreciate the genuine warm sympathy depicted in every anxious face of the continuous stream towards the telegraph offices for the latest bulletins.

All enlightened Hindoos already admit the Aryan theory, that the three Brahmanical-threads classes have as little connection with the aborigines of Hindustan, as with the descendants of Ishmail, and that they belong to some unknown people, who came from the North-West, possibly the bondsmen of the Persian Darius.

This large digression from the original subject of this letter has only been made to show that, until the influential sections of our Aryan brethren (the main aristocracy of India) will take the trouble to trace their own identity, they will not see what a gross mistake some have made, by joining themselves to the undoubtedly highly educated aborigines to form as spurious a democracy as we have in England.

No doubt the pressure in Parliament, then under a genuine liberal party, on the assumption of the Government of India by Her Majesty, intended by education to advance the people of India to help and join in what is now styled self-government, and Lord Canning fully appreciating the history of India, desired to support the original status of the landed classes in our late annexed province (Oudh) and even to resuscitate in our older Provinces the consequence of the natural leaders of native society, when he markedly urged the aristocracy to come forward in public life and educate their sons, so as to maintain their position and discharge the duties pertaining thereto.

No native of India can deny that Steam, the Telegraph and the Railroad are advancing enlightenment in India. Even the agriculturist is deriving produce from barren wastes; there are new mechanical professions and old indigenous ones are being improved; but, as was remarked in a late address of a municipality, "they must not be considered unmixed blessings to the poor." The address of course referred to the heavy burdens of the poor rayyet. The export of their grain on which they are congratulated raised the price of food (to follow their idea of expressing rates) from 2 and 3 maunds to 16 and 18 seers per rupee. The Municipality were fully aware that the poor agriculturist, living hand to mouth, obtained no advantage (never heard) of the depreciated rupee; they knew that the laudatory expression of gratitude, on the opening of the new line of rail to their locality, was only for the rich. The export of grain may raise it to 3 and 400 per cent. of what it used to fetch in former years, but the cultivator scarcely profits, while he loses his food supply; the import of foreign produce as luxuries, must increase the wealth and comfort of all localities reached by the rail, but it is the monied man who possesses the grain in vast stores and can afford the luxuries. The poor rayyet, even after a good harvest, has not been taught or encouraged in thrift, as of old, to prevent his small savings being claimed by the woman-kind to be turned into ornaments for disposal of the savings; maunds of brass utensils, thans of Saloo are purchased for stores for the next wedding in the family. If Lord Northbrook's original scheme of having District Savings Banks had not omitted the one clause, absolutely necessary for its success, it might have been the greatest boon to the agriculturist, 80 per cent. of the population of India. No provision was made in the scheme to remunerate the Treasury Department for the extra work that would have been thrown on it; so is it at present with the Postal Savings Banks. The consequence is, that hardly a single agriculturist has been allowed, much less encouraged, to deposit his savings. We find that 5 or 6 millions are so deposited and the amount is steadily increasing, but the agriculturist is nowhere, the deposits representing the savings of the favored civil and military pensioners and of the Government amlah.

The object of this letter is to show that it is the enormous 80 per cent. agricultural population of India, brought up under the feudal system, who crave for Government administration through the aid of their own aristocracy, the men who should be in the Statutory Civil Service, with whom they are so much more in touch, than they can possibly be with their European rulers, and whom they can trust better than the low caste portion of the amlah-risen and educated Barrister classes. To return to our criticism on the Public Service Commission. It may be observed in their proceedings that several heads of Department were lengthily examined, who by the nature of their offices could not have had much experience of the working of this short lived valuable class of judicial officers, also that quite junior civilians were pressed for their opinions, who prima facie, from the records, may be mistaken for old experienced hands. The opinions of natives of all classes were obtained, the value of whose evidence without reasons, would not be indicated by their depositions alone.

It may be asserted that even to the experienced Indian members of the India Council, such records must be almost valueless.

By personal acquaintance with some of the latter class of witnesses, it cannot but be observed, that many of the best opinions are to be found in the Punjab volume of Proceedings; these, always most modest in their terms, are from gentlemen too well bred and loyal to animadvert on the failings of selection for the Statutory Service, but all evidently implied that the system had not yet had a fair trial.

Although none can deny that the competitive system must produce the highest talent of the land, both for Europeans and for natives, still for such responsible duties, as those required from the Indian Civil Service, and considering the powerful positions they held for use and abuse, a much higher and more valuable test for efficiency is necessary for both, i.e., that of innate honourable character and honesty, certified on knowledge of antecedents by responsible guardians and teachers.

In this democratic age, it must be admitted that even with the best education, it takes three generations to make a gentleman. As a highly enlightened native Deputy Collector, of good family, suggested a few years ago (during Lord Ripon's régime) "Government and many European officers put implicit faith on many of us individually, but will the general native public, so long accustomed to hear of every case being purchased, trust us even as District Magistrates? No, they would fear that the promotion would only lead to demand of higher fees." Nay, it is either by personal acquaintance or from local repute (very rapidly spread) that the native public know when they have one of their aristocracy to deal with. When they have to appear in Court, it is the genuine Statutory Civilian they would prefer. As for the system, it must be acknowledged that, although under indefinite instructions, put on a wrong basis, it is now found wanting, it is unjustly, injudiciously condemned.

Our new Evidence Act, again, is often so complicated in its definitions, so opposed to common sense, as regards proof of intention, that, guided by their superior knowledge of customs and habits of parties before them, with instinctive knowledge of their intentions quite lost to Europeans, the Statutory Civilian is often guided by what we should consider moral evidence—let us style it honest common sense.

Let us not forget that, after the long-digested careful legal wordings of that Act, how often is it, that High Courts form the most opposed constructions.

Every one interested in Indian Administration must be glad to observe that the Secretary of State has not accepted the sweeping recommendations of the Commission with regard to the Statutory Service, so we may still hope, that not only will the branch be encouraged, but that Lord Canning's system will be extended as now by legislative enactment to Burma, to the employment of lumberdars (headmen) of villages as the best local magistrates, for one thing, as being the best judges of the value of evidence. Residents in the localities would not be bullied by the irrelevant contentions of ignorant pleaders and law agents. They would make short work of the frivolous cases brought to our Courts. They could relieve our overburdened Courts (both Civil and Criminal) of half their work.

THE TIPPERAH RAJ—AGAIN.

My last letter was concluded with the interrogation "Who will rescue the Maharaja out of their (favorites) hands?" It seems to be in the mouth of every Tipperah man. The question is often asked partly in sorrow and partly in despair, but never in anger. I think the question ought to be "Who can bring back the state to its normal condition?" The Maharaja alone can set his house in order. Every native state requires for its minister a man of both executive and administrative faculties. Happily such a man is, I think, Rai Bahadur Umakant Das. But then to set his house in order the Maharaja would be well advised to invest the minister with great and real power—I don't however mean absolute power. The ostensible minister ought to be also the actual. To kill one's stag a man must have one's sword. Of course when the man has it, it is his option to use it for one or not. But when a minister is appointed it is necessary he should have the confidence of the Maharaja, otherwise he had better not been appointed.

In olden times generally a Peshkar's son would succeed his father and a Sheristadar's son would be Sheristadar, and so on. But the son would be passed over in favor of a more competent relative recommended by the person leaving the situation. The Dewan-ship had always been an exception to the rule. Since the ascendancy of the favourites at the court, this bad custom gave place to a worse one, to wit, favourites got their own men appointed. The dilatoriness of the officers in the Maharaja's service has become proverbial. By their very leisurely movements and indolent habits one knows that they are the Maharaja's servants. A large majority of them take bribes; and they don't mind making a secret of it. Ask a man and he will tell you "Yes, I take bribes but unlike other people I have a keen eye to the interest of the Maharaja." They even go the length of complaining that "those good old days are gone when one might make a fortune out of bribes." Whether it is human frailty which vainly hankers after "good old days" or whether some obstacles have been thrown in the path of those who take bribes, I cannot tell. The service of a man depends upon the good pleasure of the powers that be. To enter the service and to continue in it, one has to humour the favourites at Agartala and the highest officers at different stations, who in their turn have to humour the favourites. Owing to these circumstances and a strong combination of the Bikrampuris against the really good and able men of the district, they cannot and do not enter the Maharaja's service. Your readers possibly think that the natives of the district were by a slow and laborious process gradually eliminated from the Maharaja's service. Nothing like it. By a handful of Bikrampuris the Maharaja was ill advised to start the Water Question. Owing to their religious scruples, the Tipperah men were obliged to make room for a large number of Bikrampuris upon whom religion sat very loose. Although there is faction within faction—for there are several factions each of which tries hard to secure its own interest, to the prejudice of the interests of others—the Rai Bahadur will find that they will make a common cause against him if he tries, as try he must, to secure the service of more efficient hands.

The Imperial Government too has a share in the mal-administration of the Maharaja's zemindary. With a fault-finding eye the British Government always makes much of little over-sights and errors. It does not, however, stop there. Your readers know how the report of Mr. Price was falsified by facts. From the not very elegant English in which it was written, I am led to believe that the report was originally framed and composed by Mr. Sandys to which his friend Mr. Price put in his name. His Highness excused Sandys a large sum of money that was owing to the state. But this does not seem to satisfy his new friend the present Magistrate of Comillah, who is said to have requested the Maharaja to try the case of Mr. Sandys again. The request has been granted. If report be true, though I cannot believe it, I hope your readers will discern what the Magistrate is driving at. Both the Maharaja and his servants are in perpetual fear of British interference—nay, they fear that the Maharaja at any moment may be made a pensioner of his own Raj.

Our Government which is full of the milk of human kindness for the population of the native states, may at any moment be overpowered by that sentiment. The thought has a paralysing effect on the administration of the Raj. The Maharaja realises rent even with trembling and loose hands. In this respect, a zemindar is always better off than a ruling Raja. It seems to be the policy of Government to weaken the hands of native Rajs by constant interference in every little particular. There is the righteous plea of relieving the Raj out of its debts, and its subjects from cruelties and oppressions, and finally giving them the benefits of English administration.

The Judge, the Magistrate and the Civil Surgeon here are very unpopular. Because the people here don't like them, they conclude that they are sent here to prepare the way for annexation of the territory. That is certainly an imaginary fear. I confess I do not see what the Judge or the Civil Surgeon has to do in the matter. Nor do I see why because the Magistrate is unpopular he should be looked upon with suspicion. The people build their suspicions on the fact that the telegraphic office here has been raised to a higher status with a Saheb at its head.

Now, the people of Tipperah have a duty which, be it mentioned to their dishonor, they have been neglecting. The influential Bhadraracy as well as the noblemen at the court ought in a body to throw themselves at the feet of the Maharaja and offer him their advice and service. Some years back a deputation of the Tipperah Hitasadhini Sabha at Calcutta was sent to the Maharaja which, it was expected, would meet with the cordial co-operation of the people here. The expectation was not realised. Many influential old fogeys here passed taunting and silly remarks upon the deputation. The members of the deputation, notwithstanding, proceeded to the capital of the Maharaja and effected what it was possible for them to effect.

"Now take my word,
Wise men of Hereford,
None in safety may be
Till the bad man doth flee.

Every one knows who is the bad man at Agartala. Captain of a band of parasites to sing the Maharaja into the sleep of fancied security, he is the captain-general of all mischief at the court.

Tipperah, July 14, 1890.

THE REIS AND RAYYET DEFAMATION CASE.

The case against Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, editor, Reis and Rayyet, for defamation, was called on on Friday morning before Mr. Justice Wilson, at the Criminal Sessions.

Mr. Woodroffe, and Messrs. Garth and Woodroffe Junior instructed by Baboo Gonesh Chunder Chunder, appeared for the prosecution.

Messrs. Bonnerjee, Henderson, and Abdur Rahman, instructed by Mr. N. C. Bose, appeared for the defence.

The Clerk of the Crown, addressing the defendant, commenced to read the first count of the indictment. As he came upon the article contained in Reis and Rayyet of the 17th May,

Mr. Bonnerjee, addressing his lordship, said that his client Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee had been advised to plead guilty, and as he knew what was contained in the article it could be taken as read.

His lordship said it could not be helped, and the article would have to be read in extenso.

The Clerk of the Crown accordingly read the article, and then passed on to the second count, which charged the defendant with having published another defamatory article in Reis and Rayyet of the 24th May 1890.

The defendant pleaded guilty to this charge also.

Mr. Bonnerjee then addressed the Court as follows:—As your lordship will see, my client has placed himself entirely in the hands of his counsel, and has authorized me to express his deepest regret for having published the two articles complained of. He has asked me on his behalf to apologize to the two sons and other relations of the deceased for any hurt that he may have caused their feelings. He had no intention whatever to do so, and thought that he was discharging a public duty in noticing the death of Deno Nath Mullick; but he was mistaken in what he did. He has undoubtedly offended against the law, and all the reparation that it is in his power to do, he is prepared to do. He wrote these articles from information, and without the slightest ill-feeling against the deceased Deno Nath Mullick or his sons, and no one was more glad than he at the fact that one of his sons, who was called as a witness in the Court below, was able to deny that the matters of fact mentioned in the articles were true. He accepts that denial, and now wishes to withdraw all that he has written. Under these circumstances I respectfully ask your lordship to deal as leniently with the defendant as the law permits.

Mr. Woodroffe: The defendant has pleaded guilty, and he has through his counsel made an apology, but I do not notice in the apology any expression of regret—such as my clients would have been glad of—withdrawing the defamatory observations which he has made.

Mr. Bonnerjee: He withdraws all that he has written.

Mr. Woodroffe: Under these circumstances I leave the matter in your lordship's hands, and I don't desire to press for punishment. We felt it was absolutely necessary for the protection of our father's character, and that it was due to his memory, that the statements made in these articles should not be allowed to pass unchallenged, and it is a satisfaction to us to know that, without putting the pressure of the law upon him, the defendant has thought fit to apologize for them. The prosecution was instituted to vindicate the memory of our father, and as we feel that we have accomplished this, we do not press for punishment. We leave the matter in your lordship's hands, as we bear no ill feeling towards Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, and we have no desire to do anything which would serve to render the unfortunate position in which he finds himself more painful, and which to an old man like him would be productive of serious consequences.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Health's Defences. None save the strongest can with impunity pass through the sudden transitions from wet to dry, from cold to muggy weather so prevalent during the autumnal and early winter months. Influenza, bronchitis, cough, sore throat, or quinsy will attack those most watchful of their health; but they can readily arrest any of these complaints by rubbing Holloway's Ointment twice a day upon the skin over the affected parts, and by assisting its corrective action with appropriate doses of his Pills. This well-known, safe, and easy mode of treatment efficiently protects the invalid both from present and future danger without weakening or even disturbing the system in the slightest degree.

His lordship then passed sentence as follows :—Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee, you have pleaded guilty to charges that had been brought against you of defamation, directly affecting the character of a dead man, but of such a kind that the publication of it tended to throw discredit on the male members of his surviving family. You have pleaded guilty, and through your counsel withdrawn all allegations against the character of the deceased and expressed your regret, and the learned counsel who appears for the prosecution does not press for punishment. On the other hand, I must remember that the offence to which you have pleaded guilty is one of a very grave character, and the law cannot tolerate that the public press should be made the medium for attacks upon a person's private character and when such attacks are made in the public prints, the law cannot allow the matter to pass without punishment. Had the trial proceeded and led to a conviction, I should have had to deal much more severely with the matter; but taking into consideration the fact that you have pleaded guilty and have withdrawn the charges which were made, and expressed your regret for them through your counsel, and taking into consideration also that the prosecution does not press for punishment, I pass upon you what I think is the least possible punishment, viz., that you be fined Rs. 500.

The fine was instantly paid.

A HUNDRED YEARS AFTER: OR SOME RESULTS OF THE PERMANENT SETTLEMENT.

Even if we put these considerations aside, and regard the question simply as one of finance, we shall find reason to believe that the sacrifice of land-revenue involved in the Permanent Settlement has not been without some compensating advantages. It is true that one channel of receipts, and that the largest, has been closed; but the fiscal reservoir has been swelled by a number of minor streams. It must be remembered that the Settlement revenue amounting to about $3\frac{1}{4}$ crores of rupees, is realised in full, alike in prosperous years and in seasons of comparative dearth. There are no bad debts, and remissions and suspensions are practically unknown. This is certainly not the case with the land tax in other Provinces. In the next place, we may fairly add to the land-revenue receipts the proceeds of the Road Cess and Public Work Cess, which amount to nearly 80 lacs of rupees. If we return to other items of revenue, we cannot fail to remember that before the salt duty was equalized a few years ago, the rate in Bengal was always higher than in other Provinces. It was only the other day that the Government of India issued a Resolution on the cost of the administration of civil justice in British India. The figures showed that whereas in the whole of India the expenditure exceeds the receipts by $12\frac{1}{2}$ lacs, in Bengal (and in that province only) there is a surplus of $14\frac{1}{4}$ lacs of rupees. Again, the educational budget in Bengal amounts to 83 lacs, but of this sum only 21 lacs are paid by the State, the remainder, or three-fourths of the whole educational expenditure, being contributed by the people themselves. The works of public utility constructed in Bengal in the year 1888 by the beneficence of private individuals, represented an outlay of Rs. 3,95,000. Under all these heads, and under a number of others which might be enumerated, we see that the policy of limiting the land-tax to a fixed sum in perpetuity has had the effect of leaving the people more abundant means to contribute to the necessities of the State through other sources of supply, and that the loss of revenue which such a policy entails is rather apparent than real.

The results which I have briefly summarised will, perhaps, induce us to pause before we condemn Lord Cornwallis as having squandered the resources of the State by a misplaced liberality to the Zemindars of Bengal. Even if we think he erred as a financier, it is difficult to resist the conclusion that he judged rightly as a statesman. We shall find the best authorities to support us in such a verdict. It is well-known that the views of one of our ablest Viceroy, Lord Lawrence, on the subject of the Permanent Settlement, underwent an entire change during his tenure of office as Governor-General. His early training was not likely to induce him to sympathize with the legislation of 1793. But he was completely converted by what he saw of the prosperity of Bengal under the Permanent Settlement, and he was desirous of extending the boon of a similar settlement to the Province of Oudh. The wisdom of such a measure is a question, which, as I have already said, I do not propose to discuss; but I feel no doubt that the lessons taught by the experience of the Permanent Settlement should be laid to heart by those who are called upon to decide the question of giving fuller effect to the policy of Lord Cornwallis within the territories under the Government of Bengal. It so happens that, in the course of the next seven years, the Bengal Government will have to take in hand two extensive and important settlements, one in the extreme south-west, and the other in the extreme south-east, of the Province. The thirty years settlement of Orissa expired in 1866, just at the time when the country was desolated, and almost depopulated, by the great famine of that year. It was no time to consider what increase of revenue could be obtained and the old settlement was renewed without enquiry or alteration, for a further term of thirty years, which will expire in 1896. The settlement will thus have run for a period of sixty years, during which the Government has lavished immense sums on the protection of the country from drought and floods, and on the improvement of its communications. About 800 miles of embankments and nearly 250 miles of canals are maintained by the Government in Orissa. The last of these works, the Orissa Coast Canal, has just been completed at a cost of more than 40 lacs of rupees. But all this outlay would seem to have effected very little for the prosperity of the Province. The people of the three districts of Orissa are ignorant and poor; the condition of the peasantry is wretched; the only manufacture is that of salt, and this is steadily declining; the income-tax realized from the entire province is only Rs. 52,000, a smaller sum than is contributed by the single district of Purneah or Dinagepore. The total revenue from all sources is only 31 lacs, or little more than one rupee per head of population. It might be thought that a great religious centre like Pooree, attracting pilgrims from all parts of India, would add materially to the wealth of the Province, but its principal effect, (setting aside its spiritual benefits) seems to be the dissemination of cholera. So backward is the condition of the Province that, though every effort is made to employ the natives, a large proportion of the officials have to be imported from Bengal.

What is the remedy for this deplorable state of things? I hesitate to say that the remedy is to be found in a permanent settlement of the land; but I think that a comparison of the condition of Orissa with that of Bengal may well lead our rulers to consider whether the experiment of a permanent settlement is not worth trying.

The other settlement to which I have referred, is that of the Noabad talooks in the district of Chittagong. These talooks were settled by Sir Henry Ricketts, for a term which was afterwards extended to fifty years, and the settlements will expire between 1892 and 1897. The zemindaree title in the lands belongs to the Government, but the talookdars have a right to settlement; and, as representing the original reclaimers of the soil, they may reasonably expect to be fairly and liberally treated. It would, I believe, be a wise and politic step to recognize these talookdars as proprietors, and to grant them a settlement of the land-revenue in perpetuity. Such a settlement was promised them more than forty years ago by Lord Dalhousie, but the offer was then clogged with conditions which the talookdars were unwilling to accept. I should be glad to see the promise now fulfilled. The land-revenue of Chittagong is already high for a Bengal district, being about Rs. 80 for each 100 of the population; and this sum will be considerably increased at the approaching settlement of Noabad talooks. The surrender of any subsequent demand will involve no great sacrifice, while it may be expected to produce the same effect as it has produced elsewhere, in promoting the general prosperity and improvement of the district.

My own opinion, therefore, would be in favour of the concession of a Permanent Settlement both to the zemindars of Orissa, and to the talookdars of the Government Estates in Chittagong. Without prejudging the question as regards other parts of India, I think that the experience of a century has shown that in Bengal the Government is not a loser by limiting its demand upon the land, while its adoption of this policy brings with it a train of public benefits. Those who are apprehensive of the financial results, may perhaps be re-assured by an analogy drawn from the history of the land tax in our own country. The English land-tax was based on a valuation made in 1692, but the rate was not permanently fixed, and varied from a shilling to four shillings in the pound, every shilling yielding a revenue of about half a million sterling. In 1798 the tax was made permanent at four shillings in the pound, and those who were subject to it were permitted to redeem it. At present, only an insignificant fraction of the revenue is raised from the tax which was regarded, 200 years ago, as the most important of all the resources of the State. But will any one contend that England has been crippled or impoverished by the change of system?

In the words of the wise king, "The thing that hath been, it is that which also shall be." As in Bengal Proper, so in Orissa, and perhaps in India at large, we shall find that the deficit is filled up from a number of sources which now yield little or nothing and that the new policy subserves and promotes the nobler ends of Government, the material and intellectual progress of the people, and the elevation of the national character.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoo Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News, October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious; he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight; "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

ORIGINAL LITERATURE.

THE LAST STRUGGLE OF HARISCHANDRA, OR THE MARTYR TO TRUTH.

SCENE.—The Execution ground near the King's Palace in Kasi.

Enter the King, Queen, Officers, &c., Viswamitra (disguised as a Brahman), Harischandra (as an Executioner), Tharamathi (his Queen), Veerabáhu (the Chief Executioner), and many others.

HARISCHANDRA.—(To Tharamathi).

Look here ! As thou must suffer death from me,
Prepare to leave the world within this hour !
And if thou wish that Heaven should favour thee,
Address thy prayers to th' Almighty's Throne !

THARAMATHI.—(Looking up).

Where'er—howe'er—hereafter my lot be cast,
Grant God ! the selfsame husband dear for lord,
For Spiritual Guide Vasishta sage,
Puissant Viswamitra to receive
A gift from these poor hauds, and for a son,
Give me my own, my Lohidasa back !

VISWAMITRA.—Mark how, his sword still hanging by his side,

He stands, unwilling that his wife should die !

HARISCHANDRA.—Say not so, worthy friend ! If I remained

Still, for an instant, gazing at the void,
'Twas only that insensible I lay,
Astonished as I was to see this Queen
Wish again for a hateful wretch as I,
Prepared to shed her life-blood with my hands !
But never ! no, it never shall be said
That ever Harischandra broke his word,
Or let his feelings sway him from the right !
Even though it be my noble-minded Queen
That stands condemned before his Royal Grace,
I needs must deal the blow, and take her life !

(Raises his sword.)

(Vishnu the Preserver appears on a sudden, and arrests the blow.)

VISHNU.—Hold ! Hold ! It shall not be ! Thou shalt not strike !

HARISCHANDRA.—Away ! It is not right to stop me thus !

VISHNU.—'Tis Vishnu who commands thee to forbear !

HARISCHANDRA.—Do let me off, I do my Chief's behest !

Leave me alone ! I cannot disobey
The orders Veerabáhu gave to me !

VISHNU.—(Catches hold of the sword.)

Think yet again ! Náráyan bids thee pause !

HARISCHANDRA.—I see I can not shirk thy sovereign will !

(Foregoes his sword at once and falls prostrate at the feet of the God ; and so does Tharamathi.)

O Lord of All ! How could I know thee not,
Though present in thy splendour near to me ?

VISHNU.—Thine own unswerving lofty love of truth,

Unparalleled in all the worlds around,
Hath made thee heedless of my presence even !
Rise from the ground, ye blessed pair devout !

(Both rise.)

(Viswamitra comes forward on one side, and Vasishta on the other.)

VISWAMITRA.—(To Harischandra).

Hail, King of Kings, and truest of the true !
Accept the homage of an humble sage,
A passionate, unknowing, cruel man,
Who knew not that thy name can ne'er be stained,
And could not bear to hear thee highly praised
Before the Thousand-eyed and all the Gods !
The race of man is honoured by thy name,
Which I before so senselessly reviled !
Thy like has never been, and never shall
Be seen in Hell, on Earth, or even in Heaven !
And, for the ills I wrought thee, noble Prince,
Vouchsafe thy gracious pardon unto me !

HARISCHANDRA.—(Bows to Viswamitra).

It ill becomes immortal Kausika
To speak to a poor mortal in this wise !

(To Vasishta).

I reverently bow my head to thee,
And crave thy blessing on the Solar Line !

THARAMATHI.—(To Vasishta).

Thy pupil Harischandra's loyal queen,
The childless Tharamathi bends her head,
Low as the ground, before her honored Priest,
The purest, best of Swarga's many saints !

VASISHTA.—Long be you blessed each with the other's love !

And, Harischandra, thou, my blessed son,
Thy high regard for right rejoiceth me,
And fills the triple world with thy renown !
For through thy faith in virtue have I won
A wager which was laid in Indra's Court.

VASISHTA.—“ The childless Tharamathi ” ! Empress dear,

'Twas I that heartless killed thy lovely child !
But utter once the name of thy lost one,
And he shall promptly hasten to thy arms !

THARAMATHI.—(Aloud).

My darling Lohidasa, come to me !
My angel sweet, thy mother longs for thee !
Oh Loh—

(Enter Lohidasa, bowing to all).

THARAMATHI.—Come ! Let me strain thee in my arms, my child,

And pour unnumbered kisses on thy brow !
Look how, with streaming eyes and beating hearts,
Thy loving parents long for thy embrace !

HARISCHANDRA.—Haste ! Haste to me, my joy, my tender hope,

And let me press thee to my bosom here !

(Lohidasa prostrates himself before Vishnu).

VISHNU.—Long be thou spared to lead a spotless life,

Becomes as True King Harischandra's son !
And now, my Emperor and Empress sweet,
Let all depart hence for their several homes !
Return you to Ayodhya, there to reign—
To spread among your people peace and joy—
To gladden all your faithful subjects' hearts,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Which pant to greet their favorite sovereigns back !
And, when this peerless Prince improves in years,
As worth enough to rule your fair domain,
Resign the charge with blessings to his hands ;
And, resting from a kingdom's trying cares,
If you should start to travel heavenwards,
You shall receive a cheery welcome there !

HARISCHANDRA.—Almighty Lord ! Soul of the Universe !

Eternal source of Life and Light to all !
Since now it has been granted unto me
Thy ever-beaming countenance to see,
My many troubles dwindle into nought
Before the bliss of this auspicious day !
Thy glorious presence and thy gracious speech
Have banished from my mind all thoughts of woe,
And fresh inspire me with unbounded zeal
To lay my all before thy feet Divine !

THE Bey of Tunis has abolished slavery in his dominions. A decree promulgated enjoins every employer of negro domestics to give them legalized certificates declaring them free, under a penalty of from 200 to 2,000 francs. Selling, buying or keeping a slave exposes a person to from three months to three years' imprisonment.

CLOSE scientific observations show that in the St. Gothard tunnel "as between summer and winter, the temperature only varies eight degrees centigrade, that there is a continual current of air passing through the tunnel—in winter in both directions, and in summer only in one—and that, as a result, the tunnel is the clearest in the world, its atmosphere being almost absolutely pure."

WE read :—

"A German anatomist has called the attention of his class to certain hysterical women who are afflicted with a kind of 'pain joy,' not only experiencing no pain from surgical mutilation, having a morbid desire to bear without an anæsthetic operation which should prove very painful. A young woman was introduced who had seriously injured her lower jaw during a paroxysm of hysteria, but who had insisted upon having the necessary removal of a part of the jaw and ligature of two arteries performed without an anæsthetic, and subsequently declared that the operations had given her great pleasure."

There is no end to human idiosyncrasies. The poets who sang of the joy of grief or the luxury of pain must now hide their diminished heads.

By name Syed Mahomed Alsagoff would seem to be a Russo-Tartar, but then neither Cossack nor Tartar can be a Syed. He is what is here popularly called a Nakhoda, that is, an Arab merchant, of Singapore. A man of great intelligence, enterprise, and public spirit, a municipal commissioner, he is the wealthiest and most influential Mahomedan in the island. A great trouble has overtaken him. He was about to go to Europe, but was arrested in the midst of a farewell dinner given by him to his friends, on a charge of attempting, in conjunction with another Arab, an abortion on the person of a European girl named Marie Gorskie. This girl lately came to Singapore with her father and mother from Egypt, in hopes of finding a living in the Far East. Wishing to go farther, they begged Syed Mahomed Alsagoff for a passage to Shanghai. The acquaintance thus started led to more familiar intercourse between the parties. Indeed, the descendant of the Prophet was understood to be particularly kind to the fair Nazarene and she gracious to him. Meanwhile, the strangers from Egypt were in no hurry to sail to China, if they had not definitely abandoned their idea altogether. In due course, report reached the Police of an attempt to procure an abortion by Marie. In the inquiry that followed, two Arabs were implicated, one of them being the Syed. There is quite a sensation in Singapore, not only among the Malays and Moors, but also in "society" too, in which the principal prisoner, Alsagoff, is a well-known figure.

AT the Berlin Surgical Congress, Professor Gluck illustrated an advance in surgery—the successful substitution of catgut, ivory and bone for defects in bones, muscles and nerve sinews.

"The inserted material sucks up the juices of the body, establishing the junction of the separated ends without any shortening of the part. Professor Gluck presented cases in which mobility had been restored to defective fingers—a hitherto impossible feat—by insertion of from two to four inches of catgut; a case in which the removal of a tumour from the thigh had left a defective bone, which was remedied by the insertion of ivory, shortening being prevented; and a case in which a large piece of nerve in the groin had been replaced with catgut, with no serious impairment of functions."

RECENTLY Mr. John Morley said that there are not fifty living persons—nay, not twenty—who make their living by the writing of books. To this Mr. Walter Besant replies that there are at least fifty novelists living whose stories bring them incomes of £1,000 per annum—not to speak of a vast number who make a hundred or two. And, he might have added, a vaster host who make nothing. Has the statesman already forgotten his own?

IT is now known, that is, made public, that Lieutenant Grombchevsky, who failed to enter Afghanistan from the north,

"last October attempted to penetrate Kanjat from the Little Pamir; but had to retrace his steps on 21st November. Accompanied by only two men he crossed the Karakoram Pass, and during December examined some smaller passes in the neighbourhood. Early in the following month Mr. Grombchevsky started up the Karu Kash River with a guide and two Cossacks, and succeeded in reaching the desert plateau of Western Tibet. The party suffered terribly from cold and at an altitude of 17,000 feet nearly lost their lives in a snowstorm. They had to return in great haste, and after an unsuccessful attempt to reach Hindutagh Pass marched to Killian and Polu. Grombchevsky did not make any startling discoveries, but succeeded in linking his surveys with Prejalsky's."

MR. P. G. Melitus having gone back to the Assam Commission, Mr. E. G. Colvin is Gazetted the Officiating Post-master-General, Bengal.

THE Upper India Chamber of Commerce is activity itself. Since its birth the other day, it has interested itself in all possible questions affecting the commerce of the country. On the 1st of this month, the Committee not only addressed the above letter but urged on the Government the desirability of a second line of railway from Northern India to Calcutta, independent of the East Indian Railway Company. They say :—

"The survey of the country between Moghal Sarai and Calcutta has, they understand, been completed, and it is probable therefore that an early decision may be expected as to the actual route to be followed by the new line, and by what Company or Corporation the system is to be controlled."

Various conflicting statements have been current during the past few months regarding the intentions of the Home authorities in this matter; but whether the line is constructed and worked by Government or by a Company, either independently or in connection with the O. and R.

Railway system, are issues that do not affect the interests of traders in the N.-W. P. and Oudh, given that an alternative route to and terminus at Howrah—Calcutta—is provided entirely independent of the East Indian Railway Co. To in any way extend the sway which that Company has over the communications with the Bengal seaboard would be fatal to mercantile and railway enterprise in these Provinces.

The subject has doubtless received the careful consideration of the Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner, and my Committee feel assured that His Honor will not be disposed to favour any arrangement calculated to maintain or extend the monopoly now enjoyed by the East Indian Railway Company."

THE East Indian Railway is to be purged of its old hands under the fifty-five years' rule. Such is the information of the Morning Post.

THE Judges of the High Court have repealed Rule 467 at page 209 of Belchambers' Rules and Orders and ordered new Rules for the preparation of Paper-books in Appeals from the Original Side. These rules come into effect from the first day of August next. They will be found in this week's Calcutta Gazette and will apply to appeals filed on and after the 1st August, the old rules operating as regards appeals filed previous to that date.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

PARLIAMENT will be prorogued on the 12th of August.

PRINCE Albert Victor is suffering from fever said to be contracted in India, and has been ordered to the seaside.

THE discipline of the Army has been vindicated, and the Grenadiers have, after all, been punished all round for their late mutiny. The Duke of Cambridge admonished them saying how ashamed he was of their conduct and that they had disgraced her Majesty's uniform, and finally disowned any further connection with them. The battalion has been packed off to "the remote Bermudas." Colonel Maitland has retired on half pay. The Adjutant has been censured and has resigned. Three of the ringleaders have been courtmartialled to two years' imprisonment and two to eighteen months'. The spirit of discontent was, however, still visible. The reading of the sentences over, two of the men tore off their medals and threw them across the parade ground. The sentences are considered too severe both by the press and the public. At a meeting in Hyde Park, a petition to the Queen has been adopted for release of the prisoners.

THE Select Committee on the Uncovenanted Service grievances held six meetings and will hold no more. The report is being ready. It will, it is expected, be favorable to those concerned.

ON the 24th, Sir James Fergusson, in the House of Commons, moved the second reading of the Bill for the cession of Heligoland. Mr. Gladstone's attitude on the Bill has surprised his followers. He said that the permission of the House for the cession was unprecedented, and trenched on the prerogative of the Crown, and he, therefore, withdrew from the debate. On the Bill itself he had no opposition to offer. He believed the Anglo-German convention reflected great credit on Lord Salisbury. Strange G. O. M.

THE Bengal Chamber of Commerce has found a powerful ally in the Incorporated Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool in its opposition to the income tax on profits of consignments to India. The Committee of the East India and China Trade Section of the Liverpool Chamber lately considered the matter and came to the same conclusion with the Bengal Chamber. The Incorporated Chamber of Liverpool have since memorialized the Secretary of State for India, pointing out that the tax is a practical re-imposition of import duty on merchandise. It is not easy to swallow the pill thus administered.

It has for a long time been a favorite object of British merchants and statesmen to establish an inland trade communication between British India and China. The annexation of Upper Burma has simplified matters in that direction, and the commencement of a railway to Yunan may be looked forward to at an early date. The importance and feasibility of the undertaking are generally admitted. The difficulty is as to the route to be adopted, there are so many pressed for acceptance, by their respective advocates. The old trade route by way of Bhamo strikes everybody, but then Messrs. Colquhoun and Hallett condemn it as impracticable on the ground of its topographical difficulties. According to them, no end of tunnels and bridges would have to be constructed. They suggested the Moulmein, Yahine, and Yunan line. Others, however, on various reasons, condemned this route. Another proposed route lies through the Southern Shan States. The latest recommendation is that of Mr. Bagley who, condemning all previous recommendations, insists that there is only one practicable route by which a first-class railway, with flat gradients, capable of carrying a heavy traffic, can be cheaply constructed, namely, that up the Myitnge Valley, past Thebaw to the junction of the Namyan river, and then up that valley past Lashio and Maingyan to the Salween at the Sopkyet ferry, whence the line would pass along the Salween, to near Kunlon, and then turn eastwards up the open flat valley of the Namting.

THE cry of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce against public holidays has been echoed by the Upper India Chamber. In their letter of the 1st July, the Secretary to the Upper Chamber writes to the Secretary to the N.-W. P. Government—"My committee have no desire to attempt to interfere with the number of holidays that Government may wish to grant to the several body of its employés, and, as stated in their letter of 2nd July 1889 para 4, they understand that it is not necessary that Government office holidays and those under the Negotiable Instruments Act should be synonymous." The Chamber further complain "From the lists of holidays gazetted by the Governments of Bengal, Bombay and Madras, it would appear that the date of each is fixed at the beginning of the year. The inconvenience caused by the uncertainty as to on what dates a number of the N.-W. P. gazetted holidays will fall has been pointed out in the previous correspondence on this subject." The Cawnpore Chamber is not probably aware that if the N.-W. P. Government is bad in not notifying the holidays earlier, the Bengal Government is worse in curtailing the gazetted holidays in the middle of the year.

THE Bank of Bengal, while approving of the curtailment of the Doorga Pooja holidays as now notified, doubted whether the Government had the power, "after having once published the notification in the Gazette on 11th December 1889, to alter that notification by reducing the number of days once declared to be public holidays under the Act, and that any such alteration might interfere with business arrangements entered into on the basis of the existing notification." These doubts have been disposed of by the local Government in a manner which has marked its newborn zeal for immediate suppression of the Long Vacation. The only reply to these objections we find in the published correspondence, is that the Bengal Government has been advised by the Legal Remembrancer and the Advocate-General that "there appears to be no legal objection in the way to prevent the Government from cancelling the notification of public holidays already published, and substituting in its place a new list." A Secretary to Government might be expected to know that without invoking the aid of the Crown lawyers. But what of the "interference with business arrangements entered into on the basis of the existing (December) notification"? Mr. Cotton is contemptuously silent on this head. All the same, the silence is significant. We hope the Government, in its zeal to afford facilities to the trade and commerce of the port, will not ignore other interests, however powerless. At any rate, is it worth while to risk possible complications by withdrawing the old holiday notification and substituting a contracted schedule in its stead?

THOUGH the law would not recognize it, the Lieutenant-Governor, under the power vested in him by law, graciously allowed the native, that is, the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce to return a Port Commissioner. We read in the papers that the Chamber have just conferred the distinction on their Secretary, over the heads of the Chairman and the many Vice-Chairmen. This is no small appreciation of his influence, if not of his services. Stranger things yet remain behind.

THE Calcutta Corporation has not yet chosen its man for the Trust. The Chairman being no candidate, why should not the Vice-Chairman be elected? Perhaps he is far too envied already. The Secretary is out of the question, for he is not permitted by law. The danger, in such cases, is that the most intriguing and therefore the least desirable member of the Corporation, provided he be a heroic canvasser, undeterred by scruples and ready to stoop to any humiliation, may get in. On the whole, however, we are afraid the Hindus are in no mood to agree to vote for one of themselves. Under the circumstance, this is a good opportunity for a graceful move on their part—the nomination of a Mahomedan Commissioner of character and ability. At a time when Government are seeking to redress the balance of offices and employments between the followers of the two creeds, the great Corporation of Calcutta could not do better than give such a proof of its appreciation of the question.

MR. W. WORDSWORTH, M. A., C.I.E., Principal of the Elphinstone College, has been appointed Vice-Chancellor of the University of Bombay. The Principal well deserved the distinction and will do honor to the post. Here in Calcutta, the veteran Principals of the Presidency College, who have ruled the Department of Instruction, never rise higher than the Registrar's desk of the University. They may be knighted by the Queen, but they are never thought of for the Vice-Chancellorship by the Viceroy. (By the bye, why not Vicequeen? A nut for Sir Alfred Croft to crack.) We hope next time it will be the turn of our Alfred of Educational Bengal. Mr. Tawney is far too shy for preferments and perquisites.

IN the Hongkong Bank Forgery case, on Thursday last, after six days' trial, Elias H. Solomon was unanimously found guilty by the jury, specially empanelled, on three charges out of 15—of dishonestly and fraudulently using forged documents purporting to be valuable securities, knowing them to be forged, or having reason to believe them to be forged. The Judge, Mr. Justice Wilson, sentenced him to eight years' rigorous imprisonment on the first count, and considered it unnecessary to pass separate sentences on the other charges. Defended by The Woodroffe, who was feild like a Prima donna, instructed by the great Gonesh the assurer of victory, Solomon was not prepared for the disastrous end. He broke down as soon as the verdict was given and was weeping when the sentence was being pronounced. He had evidently relied on the pluck and prestige of the counsel who had often enough saved malefactors and repeatedly wrested cut-throats and parricides from the gallows, to carry him safely through the tedious trial. The next day, the Standing Counsel, by permission of the Court, withdrew the Bank of Bengal charges against the accused.

There is nothing more doing in the matter, we are afraid. The Jews are sad but in despair.

CONSTANTINO, an Italian, was tried by Mr. Justice Farran of Bombay and a special jury, for murder on the 8th instant of Moldotti Angelo, the baker on the S. S. Bisagno, then lying at the Victoria Docks. The Jury found him guilty of culpable homicide not amounting to murder. But no sentence was passed as the prisoner, through his counsel Mr. Kirkpatrick, had contended that the court had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as the crime had been committed on a foreign vessel by a foreigner on a foreigner. The Full Bench for which the point was reserved, on the 24th heard the argument, and the next day, the Chief Justice decided against the prisoner, and Mr. Justice Farran sentenced him to twelve months' rigorous imprisonment. All the lore in the Law of Nations adduced in behalf of the accused could not, we take it, conquer the lifelong impression of the one refrain dear to Britons—"Britannia rule the waves." Does the Italian Consul accept the judgment of the Full Bench?

THE Jain defamation case has been adjourned again to 2nd August, as one of the defendants was absent, but chiefly for the convenience of counsel. The Honorable Magistrate Syed Ameer Hossein advised the parties to settle their differences out of Court, and gave them to understand that if they could not be friends again, he would not take up the case himself but send it up to the Sessions. This is essentially a religious case and ought to be kept out of Court. The Moorshedabad panchayat has held that the complainant Indra Chand Nahatta has not transgressed the rules of his caste by doing anything, during his travel to Europe, or living contrary to the tenets, usages and customs of the Jain society and religion. It is satisfactory to outsiders to find that the Sri Sing—the Jain Panch—of Jodhpore is of the same opinion too. That ought to secure Inder Chand free intercourse with as many of his castemen and unrestricted entry to as many temples as he cares for or can possibly maintain, and make an end of the affair. An enlightened man like him may let the conservatives go to—the Tirthankars.

ARTHUR LABOUCHERE, of Hooten Levitt Hall, near Sheffield, was hauled up before Messrs. Justices Denman and Charles for contempt of court. The accusation was that he had set his hounds upon John Thomas Beale, a solicitor's clerk, who had been to Labouchere's residence to serve a writ for goods sold and delivered and work and labour done for him by a bell-hanger named Bell. Labouchere contended that he had no idea of entrapping Beale, but that Beale had followed him without invitation while the dogs—new arrivals from Ireland and accustomed to writs—were loose and yapped at the writ with pleasure, that he did not purposely release the hounds or incite them to run about or bark at the clerk. Mr. Justice Denman thought that Labouchere did not intend any serious mischief to Beale but had a mind only to frighten him. At the same time, the Judge characterized the action of Labouchere as the most outrageous contempt that had been committed, and, accordingly, fined him £100 and saddled him with the cost of the proceedings as between solicitor and client.

THE phrase contempt of court can be twisted into endless varieties. We do not remember a case in which a Magistrate was taken to task for it. Ceylon, however, supplies the curiosity. A horse dealer by name Pate purchased a horse at Daniels' auction sale. The animal was not paid for at the time and the auctioneer refused to part with it without payment. Resenting the refusal to a wellknown horse dealer, Pate forcibly carried off the animal, and the auctioneer Daniels, equally wellknown, not to be outdone, charged Pate with theft of the horse. By this time, the animal had passed into the possession of the Chief Justice Sir Bruce Burnside. The charge of theft was heard by the Magistrate Mr. Mason who, being informed that the horse was standing before the court harnessed with another horse to a carriage, ordered the Police Inspector Brown to unyoke the animal and deliver it to the auctioneer. On learning that the carriage was of the Chief Justice, Brown could not be as unceremoniously prompt as a police officer ordinarily is in proceeding against the person or property of an ordinary individual. He hesitated, then reported and awaited further orders. The Magistrate, however, was not as hesitating. He only repeated his former order, Chief Justice or no Chief Justice. Brown now returned to the seizure, and while the horse was being unharnessed, the Private Secretary to the Chief Justice had arrived at the scene all excitement and wrath, and, without interfering with the process of law, noted down everybody's name and address. Thus ended the day's proceedings. Next morning, the magistrate, inspector and auctioneer were all hauled up for contempt of court, the Chief Justice himself with Mr. Justice Dias forming the court for trial of the offenders. What transpired in that court is thus reported. The Chief Justice

"solemnly warned the magistrate that the insult offered to the majesty of justice was a terrible one. 'The precincts of this Court,' said Sir Bruce Burnside with fine gravity, 'are sacred and cannot be invaded at the instance of any official, be he who he may. I use the words "be he who he may" advisedly. Your process was a process you had a perfect right to issue, but you must have known—you did know, and we feel you did know—that you were violating the independence and the dignity of this Court, and insulting the Judges who were then sitting in this Court in the exercise of their functions. The punishment which I am about to impose on you will, I trust, serve as warning to all, and I accordingly inflict on you a fine of £20 (Justice Dias whispered something to the Chief Justice at this stage); I mean £10, and you stand committed until the amount is paid.' So also the poor inspector was treated to heavy judicial thunder and severely reprimanded; and the long-suffering auctioneer, after being told that he had perjured himself, was fined £5. With this the outraged Majesty of law was satisfied, and the excitement quieted down; and the Chief Justice has regained possession of his horse."

WE read in the Argus—the Madras journal of Law, Justice, Police—of July 18:—

"A case of alleged defamation of character, preferred against Saravanan by Gooroomoothoo Pillay, has been occupying the attention of Mr. Sultan Mohideen Saib Bahadoor at the Town Court since May last. His Worship delivered judgment in this case yesterday. Consequent upon the decease, on 29th March last, of the complainant's father, who was a Dharmakata of Therinavithi Ammen Covil, he (the complainant) printed certain notices and circulated them to his friends asking them to be present at the funeral rites of the deceased. While assembled there and partaking of the good will of the complainant, the guests were each served with a memo containing certain allegations against the deceased by the accused, upon which they left, thinking it beneath their dignity to stay with the complainant any longer. The allegations were to the effect that the deceased was not the Dharmakata; that he defrauded the Pettacherri people of Rs. 40,000, being the amount obtained from rents and profits for 20 years; that he pledged the idols of the temple, that he was a vinegar seller and an ice-seller, and contained various other imputations tending to damage his (deceased's) reputation and hurt the feelings of the complainant. The complainant thereupon prosecuted the accused on the ground that the imputations were perfectly groundless and had been made with a view to injure the posterity of the deceased and to vilify his memory. Furthermore, they had exposed him to much disgrace at the hands of the public and people of his own caste. His worship in delivering judgment, said that the parties belonged to two different factions. The temple in question was under the management of two Headmen belonging to the above factions and were nominated by public election. The father of the complainant and father-in-law of the accused (since deceased) had held the offices of Dharmakata to the temple and on the death of the former on 29th March last while his Curmanthorum was being performed, one Gnanapathi Pillay, a friend of the deceased, published three verses in praise of him, whereupon the accused in reply also published certain stanzas to the effect that the deceased sold vinegared pickle and that his females sold vinegar. The question was whether the verses published by the accused contained defamatory matter as defined in Section 499, I. P. C.; whether the publication imputed anything to the deceased Dharmakata, and whether it would harm his reputation were he living or calculated to be hurtful to the feelings of his family or relatives. His Worship, after a careful review of the documents published by the accused, failed to find anything defamatory that was likely to injure the reputation of the deceased or hurt the feelings of his family or relatives, and his decision had been arrived at after paying due regard to the oral and documentary evidence before him. Two witnesses for the prosecution had admitted that the complainant was not lowered in their estimation by reason of the publication. Then where the defamation lay he failed to see. The epithet of vinegar seller could not be hurtful to the complainant as the 1st witness for the prosecution had admitted that the deceased sold vinegar. He was therefore of opinion that the complainant had failed to make out a case against the accused to enable the Court to frame a charge against him, and accordingly directed his discharge."

Sultan Moheedin Saheb seems to have regarded the case as a mischievous attempt at persecution under colour of law. With the unsophisticated intelligence and knowledge of native society of an Oriental gentleman of experience, he failed to find anything defamatory that was likely to injure the reputation of the deceased or hurt the feelings of his family or relatives in the statements that the deceased was a pickler and his ladies vinegar-sellers, that he was not the Dharmakata of the temple, that he had defrauded the Pettacherri people, during the long course of twenty years, of rents and profits amounting to Rs. 40,000, and had gone the length of pledging the very gods of worship of the temple. If the matter is carried to the Madras High Court he will probably have his eyes opened by the European Judges. The accused will then see the enormity of his rashness in raking up matters—even though true—concerning a private man. The Madras Magistrate did not even recognise the sanctity of the dead. A dead ass might be more dangerous to meddle with than a living lion.

We have received a complaint from Madaripore which presents the leading officials there in no amiable light. The complaint relates to the local School, and its origin may be traced to the disposal of the patronage connected with it. It appears that one of the Moonsiffs is Secretary to the School. The Head Mastership being vacant, the Secretary appointed a B. A. of the Calcutta University, without, it is said, consulting the Committee of the School. This has doubtless vexed the members, who all wished to have a hand in the bestowal of a post of consequence in Pedlington. The new man is represented to be no good. A worse objection to him is that he is a connection of the Moonsiff's. Then the 1st or highest class of the School formally addressed the Committee alleging their dissatisfaction with the Headmaster's teaching. What notice was taken of the grievance we do not know, but we are told the subdivisional officer, accompanied by the two Moonsiffs of the place, proceeded from Court to the School and had the boys of the 1st class disgraced and soundly lashed by the hand of a low Mussulman. The families of the boys, it is said, have taken the harshness and indignity to heart.

The story seems incredible, but worse things occasionally happen, and there are no lengths to which little men dressed in brief authority may not go in playing fantastic tricks before High Heaven. We hope both the Educational Inspector and the District Officer will inquire. The three officers concerned would scarcely be worth their salt if they could not send in a report that might be deemed satisfactory.

THE Forest Department in Bengal sold last year nearly fifteen millions of bamboos. In the previous year it was a million more. The decrease is observable in all the forest divisions, chiefly in Chittagong.

The multitudinousness of this forest produce has struck the imagination of our Anglo-Indian contemporaries. Bamboos by tens of millions! why, there surely must be some bamboo—zement! Not a bit of it though. The Englishman writes:—

"Innumerable as are the purposes to which this product is applied, exceeding even those of the kerosine oil tin, it is difficult to imagine how this enormous number could have been disposed of."

Nor is that all. What must be our contemporary's astonishment, when we tell it that the little principality of Tipperah also produces many millions of bamboos! The entire valley of the Megna is supplied from that state, and during the rains boats laden with Tipperah bamboos may be met with in all the waters of East Bengal, from Sylhet down to the Fenny river which divides Noakhali from Chittagong, and as far West as the Dacca Division. Private properties in the hills of Sylhet and the forests of Mymensingh, &c., also contribute the same article. The wonder is lessened when one comes to consider the kind of bamboo chiefly in question. People in talking of bamboo think of the stouter or the close-grained wiry sorts. But the bamboo of internal commerce in the more Eastern parts is a very different thing—it is the moollee bams—the thin, cylindrical, short, frail and hollow bamboo, which would be called in Calcutta the taltt bams. It is this bamboo, beautiful and weak like lovely woman, that is reckoned by millions. There are whole forests of this plant. The low hills on the Eastern frontiers of Bengal are covered with it. The demand is equal to the production. This plant is the principal material in housebuilding in a country the architecture of which is principally of bamboo and reed or grass. Houses so constructed, so weak and entirely at the mercy of the elements—the worst being fire—have to be periodically renewed and frequently rebuilt. Hence the great proportions of the trade in bamboo.

THERE is nothing too bad to be thought of the Baboos. Among other sins laid at their door, they are far and away the most litigious of the peoples of India. This is a great mistake, if our opinion is worth a jot. The facts seem all the other way. The British laws offer endless possibilities of litigation, and there are chapters of the precious Indian Penal Code which have not yet been turned up by our people. Not so our brethren in other parts. Here is an instance. The Deccan Times of July 22 reproduces from the Kathiawar Times of the 15th July, the following criminal information:—

"On the 10th July, one Tribhovan Fulchand, in charge of the Jamdakhant of His Highness the Thakore Sahib of Morvi, complained before Mr. Patwardhan in charge Nayadhis of Vankaner against one Kirchand Devji, son of Vakil Devji Ravi of Rajkot State. The said Tribhovan said on oath:—"The accused Kirchand Devji had written two letters, one dated 17th and the other, dated 25th June last to Matushri Monghiba Sahib (mother of the Thakore Sahib of Morvi.) These letters were addressed by Shett Hirachand Kirchand. On inquiry, it was found that Heerachand is the son of the accused Kirchand and the accused wrote false letters in the name of his son. From these letters it appears that the accused has instigated the Matushri to make short work of Raniji (the Rani of the Thakore Sahib of Morvi) and her son (Hemobha) by means of Mantra Shashtra (sorcery or incantations.) Under this circumstance, I charge the accused under section 302 with 115, 463, and 417 of the Indian Penal Code. In connection with the above, a third letter has also been written. It is dated 21st June and is addressed to Moghiba Sahib, but in it is not mentioned the name and place of the writer, though I believe it to be written by the accused as it is in continuation of the above letters. I produce the original letters in the Court."

That will be a revelation to our readers on this side. We can fancy the astonishment with which they will read the news. Certainly, there is no record of such a case in the Bengal Reports. Nor is there any likelihood of such a one cropping up. There are thousands here as elsewhere who believe in the absurdities of maran, bashi karan, and the rest, but no Fulchand would find in the whole Tribhuvan of this Presidency a lawyer who would support him. Our pleaders are not profound, but they have a wholesome dread of that ridicule which is said to have pursued Horace Walpole through life and made him do injustice to his own better character.

Our nonlegal readers scarcely grasp the significance of this Katyawar case. Poor Kirchand is charged with all the crimes from murder, abetment of murder, to forgery, down to cheating! And all for, on the prosecutor's admission, for sending letters to the Majhi Saheba of the Morvee chiefship advising her, or urging her if you will, to destroy the Rani of the Chief! The most unblushing Mooktear in Bengal would not give such advice.

THE Calcutta reception of the Congress delegate Baboo Surendranath Banerjee pleading the cause of his country in England, has not been as immediate as at Bombay, but it was none the less enthusiastic. The Town Hall, on Monday, was crowded to welcome the conqueror back. It was not all a pack of Surendranath's Own Boys that did him the honor. They were of course there, but they were vastly outnumbered by their elders—the older boys of the world. Nor was Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee, who presided and carried the meeting successfully through to the end, a packed chairman. He imparted his own enthusiasm to his hearers and they cheered and cheered him to the echo. All the more that he spoke not as a partizan but as a representative of the community. He adroitly, yet not so far as the Bengali public were concerned untruly, claimed a general character for the meeting. They were not necessarily all admirers and friends of Baboo Surendranath but, as the Chairman explained—"they had met there that evening as citizens of a large metropolis, differing probably from him on many points of his political creed, but nevertheless grateful to him for having gone to England as their delegate. It was in that capacity they had met to receive him." Amid the crowd in that unfortunate building, Mr. Bonnerjee was the only speaker who could be heard, not the stentorian guest of the evening excepted. The latter was more popular than ever, but he was not in his best form. Besides, the poor man had been sucked out at Bombay. Hence the one Banerjee was overshadowed by the other Banerjee. They are all of the same ilk, however differently they may choose to spell their names.

If lowsie is Lucy, as some volke miscalle it,
Then Lucy is lowsie, whatever befall it.

WE are truly glad to see the current number of the Calcutta Illustrated Journal, The Empress, contains on the front page a fine portrait of Mr. James Wilson, the veteran editor of the Indian Daily News, followed in the next by a well-written little memoir. This is a simple act of justice to the old knight of the quill who has weathered many a storm and fought many a battle for right. Indeed, the conductors have supplied a grave omission. They had already included three journalists in their portrait gallery, namely, Sir Charles Lawson, of the Madras Mail, the late Mr. Robert Knight, of the Statesman, and ourself, the last appearing a year back, on the 1st July, 1889. Surely, the Father of the Indian Press—and Mr. Wilson had earned the sobriquet before 1880—ought to have had precedence of the hobbledehoys. The biographical account is unfortunately deficient in dates, but withal most interesting. We hope it will be extensively read. We wish we had space enough to copy it entire. We may revert to it, however. Today we conclude with a fervent hope that he may long continue at our head, to lend his sage guidance to the Press, to mould public opinion, and interpret between the governors and the governed.

AMONG the pilgrims to Mecca this year is our well-known citizen Kassim Ariff, Surati, merchant, landholder, and silk miller. Accompanied on the journey by his family and children, he started by rail from Calcutta, on the 11th of June last, and embarked at Bombay by Messrs. Thomas Cook & Son's Pilgrim Steamer "Deccan" on the 16th June. The steamer safely passed Aden, but since then no news has been received of her arrival at Jeddah.

We have however learnt with much regret, that owing unfortunately to cholera having broken out on board that steamer, the pilgrim passengers have been detained at Kamian, for extra quarantine. How long this quarantine will last, we have no means of knowing, nor as to what has happened to the pilgrims in consequence of the breaking out of the epidemic amongst them. One thing however seems to be almost certain, that as no telegraphic news has up to this date been received of the arrival of the steamer at Jeddah, the passengers will most likely arrive there on a later date. In that case they will be deprived of the privilege of performing the Haj, which ceremony commences to-morrow. If such a mishap takes place, many of the pilgrims who can afford it, will have to wait at Mecca or Medina, for a whole year. It would not be becoming for them, to come back without performing the pilgrimage. They would thus be put not only to a great deal more of expenditure than they first estimated, but to incalculable hardships and sacrifice. We are sure the sympathy of all generous minds will be with these earnest men of the Faith. We trust that our countrymen who are passengers in that steamer may have a safe passage to Jeddah.

Holloway's Pills.—Sudden transitions from heat to cold, or from raw inclement weather to oppressive climates, favour the development of manifold diseases, which may in most instances be checked and rendered abortive by an early resort to these purifying, regulating, and strengthening Pills. This well-known and highly esteemed medicine affords a safe and easy remedy for almost every constitutional wrong which unhealthy climates, rapid changes, or dietetic errors, can engender, and effectually removes any weakness self-indulgent habits may have induced. In all conditions of the system bordering on disease such as are indicated by apathy, listlessness, and restlessness, Holloway's Pills will prove especially serviceable in begetting the vivacity of mind and body appreciated by both sound and sick.

EDUCATION IN HYDERABAD.

A REFORM Ministry in the Deccan! Surely, we are in a new Era. The Schoolmaster is not only abroad, but has penetrated to the darkest places, until we are confronted by the blessed spectacle of a Ministry of Public Instruction in the state founded by Asaf Jah the Great, with a regular machinery, including Inspectors, Professors, and all. We have before us an excellent and ably written report on education in the dominions of His Highness the Nizam for the years from October 1886 to October 1888 by Nawab Imad-ood-Daula Bahadur, B. A., Director of Public Instruction and Secretary to Education Department in the Hyderabad Government. It opens with a general survey of the extent of the field, and the small impression made upon it till within the last five years. Writing five years ago, this gentleman had thus summarised the work of the previous period: "With not a single school in the district worthy of the name of a High School—not a Middle Anglo-Vernacular school in 16 out of 18 Districts—with only six Primary Anglo-Vernacular schools, it follows that three years' hard work with increased expenditure and increased supervision will be necessary to constitute the Districts feeders to high education." Working from this starting point, Nawab Imad-ood-Daula Bahadur is to be congratulated on the extent of progress which has been achieved in the period embraced by his report. There are now more schools and more pupils, and both schools and pupils are better looked after. The schools have increased two-fold and the pupils have trebled. The inspecting agency has been also increased, and by the improvement, at the instance of the Education Department, of postal communication, unity has been secured to the work of the scattered inspecting agencies.

A notable change was effected in the period under review by the amalgamation of the Hyderabad College with the Medresa-i-Aliya under the name of the Nizam College. The Medresa was a special school for the nobility and gentry of Hyderabad, and one object in view in amalgamating it with the College was to raise the character of the education that used to be given here. The primary end in view was the retrenchment of expenditure. The old Hyderabad College had been, we learn, kept up at an artificial strength by the grant of high scholarships to all comers. The expenditure on Collegiate instruction at Hyderabad was abnormally high, being something like Rs. 2,528-5-8 per pupil. A committee was appointed to consider how the retrenchment could be best effected, and at their recommendation, the College was abolished, the services of Dr. Aghornath Chattopadhyaya, Principal, and Dr. Nishikanta Chattopadhyaya, Vice-Principal, were transferred to the Political Department, and the College classes transferred to the Medresa. That institution thus aggrandised was rechristened the Nizam College. A saving of about 13 thousand rupees was effected upon the original expenditure, and the cost of educating each pupil fell from Rs. 2530 down to Rs. 688 per annum. With regard to the scholarships, the Director of Public Instruction remarks :—

"These could not at once be discontinued without breach of faith... but they were redistributed and made tenable only by Hyderabad students who had matriculated from one of our numerous departmental or aided High Schools. The result was an immediate fall in the strength of the College and in the percentage of passes. There is no doubt however that we may confidently expect in the immediate future a far healthier rise, both in the strength and calibre of our College Classes, than was possible under the old system."

We are personally sorry that these arrangements involved a hardship to our friend Dr. N. K. Chattopadhyaya, whose services, at first meant to be utilized in some other department, had eventually to be dispensed with with the grant of a miserable gratuity of Rs. 1,329-2. If the truth must be told, his original enemy, the source of all his troubles in India, was our own "Ripon the Good," who was too truly Liberal to take so gifted a native in Government employ.

The effects of education after Western methods are thus described by the Director, in the following most interesting passage :—

"There can be no doubt that much of the taste and culture and love of manly sports observable among the rising generation of Hyderabad Nobles is due to the influence of the Medresa-i-Aliya. One has not to go far back to recall the time when a telegram addressed to folks in the City had to be sent out to Chadarghat to be translated for them ; when a young Hyderabad Noble would have considered it infra dig to hold a bat, and when a well furnished and tastefully decorated dwelling in this city was a rarity. It is otherwise now. English is freely used as a medium of conversation and correspondence, and English books and newspapers have found their way to many native houses. Our youth excel in cricket and football and hockey. Tennis and polo are extensively played. In matters of taste Hyderabad compares favorably with other parts of India. It is not an uncommon thing to see an elegantly furnished house in the heart of the City approached by nicely laid out parterres and flower beds. Our English educated youth do not show the morbid fondness for the grotesque in costume and in personal decoration, affected by the same class elsewhere. As a rule they dress neatly and well. If in some quarters there is an unfortunate predilection for European coats and collars, the coats at any rate are well cut out of decent material, and the collars are properly starched and clean. It is also important to observe with regard to our youths that their sense of reverence, and a fortiori their hold of religion, survives their schooling. So far, parents of boys sent to the Nobles' school have never complained of any unseemly display of freedom or offensive self-assertion in their sons.

But while attempting an estimate of what our public school system has done, I must not forbear to note its shortcomings. Much as the Medresa-i-Aliya and the Medresa-i-Aizza have done towards popularizing European culture among the better classes, they have not succeeded to the extent to be desired. The causes of this partial failure are manifold. Some of the pupils join school too late, others do not stay long enough ; ceremonies and feasts interfere ; inevitable holidays take away much of their time ; and all combined, effect a deplorable breach in the continuity of work. It should also be remembered that we have to deal with very raw material. We have got hold of boys not sprung either from the old lettered classes or from classes that have to live by their wits but from classes to whom the acquirement of learning or the putting of any other strain on their minds, was always a work of supererogation, and a more or less superfluous exercise. They have hitherto had enough, in some cases more than enough, of the good things of this world, and living has cost them little trouble. But now the conditions are changed. They are threatened with extinction if they do not enter life better provided. Circumstances beyond their control in the way of economic, political and administrative changes, are forcing on them a competition with orders and classes that are accustomed to live by their wits, with the inevitable result of their having to give way. Private fortunes, ancestral estates, and old possessions, are going the way of private fortunes, ancestral estates, and old possessions elsewhere. In spite of the embargo wisely placed by Government on the alienation of jagirs, not a few of them have passed under the hands of sahukars and other money-making classes."

There are in the above a firmness of hand, a fullness of knowledge, a breadth of philosophy, and withal a purity of diction and an elegant force of style, which many Britons to the manner born might envy, and which are certainly not surpassed in similar British reports. Hyderabad may well be proud of so able an officer as well as so accomplished a scholar and literary man. The presence of such a public servant is itself a proof of progress and its best guarantee. That passage opens up several important questions having a bearing on the whole Empire, but we dare not meddle with them at the fag end of an article already nearly two columns long.

THE DONS CAUGHT AT DEFINITION :

OR

THE RECENT UNIVERSITY REGULATIONS.

THE Calcutta University has again made a mess of it. It has legislated in perfect ignorance of the obvious tendencies of its recent attempt at definition. We refer to the regulations requiring from candidates for the First Arts and B.A. examinations a minimum of 66 per cent. of attendance at lectures in each subject. These hard and fast rules may have been conceived in the interests of regular studies on the part of the candidates, but the question is, Are they practicable ? The framer of these stringent regulations cannot plead want of experience as to the operation of similar regulations in the past. Those now passed are only an amendment of a Resolution of the Syndicate passed in 1864, and how that Resolution worked in practice cannot be unknown to the University authorities. It was the fruitful parent of immorality on the part of candidates as well as the Heads of affiliated institutions, who treated it as a dead letter and acted in total disregard of its existence. Instances of wilful evasion occurred by hundreds, a few of which even formed the subject matter of judicial or departmental investigation. How in the face of these wellknown facts the Dons have the courage of still further tightening their reins upon the affiliated institutions, passes our understanding.

The good old rule with which the University began work simply prescribed that candidates should have prosecuted a regular course of studies at some affiliated institution. This rule which properly left some discretion to the Principals of Colleges, was felt to be indefinite, and in 1864 it was represented by the then Director of Public Instruction, Mr. W. S. Atkinson, that a definition of the term "regular course of studies" would conduce materially to the maintenance of discipline in affiliated institutions, and also remove doubts which some Heads of Colleges entertain as to the precise meaning to be attached to that term, and he recommended that attendance on 75 per cent. of the days on which lectures were delivered should be required to entitle an undergraduate student to the higher examinations of the University. In justice to the University it must be said that this proposal was in the first instance referred to the affiliated institutions for their opinion, and having met with their unanimous approval was adopted by the Syndicate. The present regulations are an amendment of this Resolution, and by reducing the percentage from 75 to 66, they practically admit that the old percentage was too high. The reduction of the percentage, however, is not enough, and nothing short of a reversion to the good old rule with which we began will be a satisfactory or final settlement of the question. Further the advantage of the reduction, such as it is, is more than neutralised by the provision requiring the percentage of attendance in each subject. This introduces an element of great administrative difficulty, and will, we fear, lead to far worse consequences.

Before speaking of the hardships and the demoralization which we expect from the operation of these amended regulations, we will refer to the experience we possess of the working of the Resolution modified by them. It was indeed passed in consultation with and with the concurrence of Heads of Colleges, but no sooner was it passed than these Heads of Colleges saw the error they had made. They found that with all their vagueness, the old University rules had the merit of being simple and workable. The new rule of percentage was too rigid and left little discretion to them, while in many cases they bore very hard on intending candidates. In short they saw that they had got a definition at the sacrifice of their independence, and sometimes of the vital interests of their students. The proper course under the circumstances would have been for these Heads of affiliated institutions to confess their mistake and to pray for its repeal. But instead of this, they set to work to make it a dead letter. They acted in open defiance of the Resolution, and our highest educational institutions began to set examples of dishonesty in the eyes of the student population, the very thought of which is appalling. Instances of such criminal evasion of the University laws at last became a matter of open notoriety.

In one case, a native student in a European College in Calcutta narrowly escaped criminal conviction by the High Court by taking an extremely technical plea. He had gone up to an examination without completing anything like the required percentage of attendance. He was prosecuted, but he took up the ground that his act amounted to violation of a Resolution of the Syndicate rather than of a byelaw or regulation of the University, and he was discharged. On another occasion, the Principal of a Missionary College of justly high position in society and in the education service got implicated in a similar case of breach of the rules. The case was not judicially prosecuted, but after a departmental enquiry by the University authorities, the reverend gentleman was declared disqualified from certifying to the eligibility of future candidates. In some native Colleges the Resolution used to be still more flagrantly violated, and if such conduct has hitherto escaped formal censure, it is a matter of wide public notoriety. In fact, the unfortunate Resolution of 1864 has proved a powerful instrument of demoralization. We talk of moral education and of discipline, but all this must be merely idle talk so long as the authorities of our Colleges are as a rule found to practise the grossest forms of dishonesty in the eyes of their disciples. It is high time these practices should be checked, and if on enquiry it should appear that the restrictions upon the candidates imposed by the late regulations of the University have directly led to them, the restrictions should be withdrawn. The University is ready enough to frame stringent regulations, while it is practically powerless to enforce their operation. Its Resolution of 1864 was, barring its higher percentage, broad and general enough, but it has been a dead letter, and a flood of immorality has thereby been let loose on the country. These facts point to one conclusion, namely, that the resolution should be withdrawn altogether, and there should be no more restrictions on candidature than what were provided in the old rules. The University is essentially an examining body and it should not go out of its way to interfere with the business of detailed educational management. Instead of this, however, it has amended the Resolution in a way so as to make the restrictions yet more rigid. We shall take another opportunity of speaking of the far worse effects which are likely to arise from this amendment.

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS IN BENGAL.

No. 1289, dated Simla, the 3rd July 1890.

From---C. J. Lyall, Esq., C.I.E., Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of India, Home Dept.

To---The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Financial Department.

I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letters No. M1---H-1-28, dated 19th April, and No. M1---H-2-16, dated the 21st April last, to the address of the Department of Finance and Commerce, with which His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor submits a correspondence which has passed between the Government of Bengal and various Public Bodies and Associations, and makes proposals for the notification of certain days as public holidays in the Lower Provinces of Bengal under section 25 of the Negotiable Instruments Act.

The Lieutenant-Governor recommends that the holidays which have hitherto been gazetted as public holidays under section 25 of the Act should in future be distributed between two notifications, the first, issued under the Act, dealing with those Hindu holidays only the observance of which is absolutely required in order to enable Hindu employes, whether in the service of Government or of private persons, to fulfil their religious duties, and the second, issued as an executive order, including the remaining days hitherto observed as public holidays and applicable to all public offices and Magisterial and Revenue Courts under the Government of Bengal. It is explained that the ground of the distinction made is that the former class, which are days of religious obligation, are distinct from the latter, which are days of social observance only; that the effect of notifying all holidays without distinction under the Negotiable Instruments Act is to interfere most seriously with trade, shipping, and monetary business; and that the course which is recommended in regard to the Hindu holidays included in the second notification is that which has always been pursued in regard to all Muhammadan holidays, and has not been found to cause inconvenience. His Honour has no intention of in any way curtailing the holidays at present allowed to public servants in Bengal, but merely wishes to remove what he regards as a reasonable source of complaint to the mercantile community, who are unable to transact business on days notified under the Act, although large numbers of vessels arrive by sea and leave the port of Calcutta, large quantities of goods are received by rail, and bills mature and ought to be paid.

2. In reply, I am to say that the Governor-General in Council has carefully considered the proposals made in your letter and the correspondence forwarded with it, and desires me to convey his acknowledgments of the thoroughness with which the matter has been investigated and the thoughtful and considerate spirit in which His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has dealt with this difficult subject. The main principle of the proposals, to make a distinction between those holidays which require to be notified under the Negotiable Instruments Act and those which do not require to be so notified but may be allowed as a matter of executive arrangement, is one which has long been recognized in other Presidencies, and has in fact been always in force in Bengal in regard to the Muhammadan holidays, which are observed by one-third of the population of the province. It appears to the Government of India that, in view of the consequences which ensue from the notification of holidays under the Act, such notification should clearly be restricted to those days when a cessation of business is absolutely necessary, and that there is no need to apply the same process to days which are only occasions for festive and social gatherings. The proposals made by the Lieutenant-Governor have reference only to the Durga Puja holidays, and in regard to these it is shown, in paragraph 10 of your letter, that the restrictions upon business which the system hitherto followed imposes are not observed by the native community themselves. His Honour writes :—

"It is not to be forgotten that in all places in Bengal, and especially in Calcutta, the Durga Puja holidays are the season of the busiest life in all the year. The shop-keepers have no holiday, the cloth-sellers, the money-changers, the confectioners, the grocers and the general dealers are busy all day long; in the bazar there is no holiday, but business is as brisk as it can be. The clerks and sircars in the bazar are not idle men. It is only in the public offices that stagnation reigns. It is not therefore a real or just ground for complaint if in a few public offices for public reasons a few clerks are required to attend office on certain days which are allowed to remain holidays to the great majority of clerks employed in the public service."

What is here stated regarding the activity of trade during the Durga Puja holidays is confirmed by the following passage in the letter from the Secretary to the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, dated the 27th March 1890:—

"The Committee beg further to observe they take particular note of the fact that trade is very brisk during the Puja holidays, the demand for a number of articles being larger during the twelve days than throughout the rest of the year. This may be explained by reason of the large influx of people from all parts of the country bent upon making the most of the holidays. The curtailment of the holidays must necessarily involve a serious pecuniary loss to the trade."

For these reasons, while regretting that the arrangement proposed by His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor should not commend itself to those representatives of the Hindu community whose replies are enclosed in your letter, the Government of India sanctions the proposals made, and authorizes the issue of the notifications forwarded by you.

I am, however, to observe that if the Governor-General in Council rightly understands the letters from Mahamahopādhyāya Mahesh Chandra Nyāyaratna, dated the 4th and 14th November 1889, it would seem that the 23rd October is one of those days which should be set apart as required for religious observance, and His Excellency in Council would suggest, for the consideration of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor, that it might be added to the 20th, 21st, and 22nd October in the list of holidays to be notified under the Act. If this is done the balance might be redressed by removing the 24th December from the holidays to be gazetted under the Act, and entering it as an office holiday in the other notification.

3. The Governor-General in Council accepts the proposals of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor as regards the offices under the Government of Bengal to be kept open during the holidays which will henceforth not be notified under the Act. In all these offices special arrangements should be made, by contracting the hours of business, by limiting the work undertaken to what is really urgent, by granting leave to Hindu employes wherever practicable, and by utilizing as much as possible the services of their non-Hindu fellow-clerks to minimise the inconvenience which may be felt by those who have hitherto enjoyed close holidays on the days which will in future be open. Under proper arrangements, so far from hardship being entailed on any considerable section of the community, not more than three or four Hindu clerks under the Government of Bengal are likely to be affected by the change. Separate orders to the same effect will be given by the Government of India in regard to the offices directly subordinate to it which are situated in Calcutta.

4. I am to request that, with the Lieutenant-Governor's permission, this letter and yours to which it is a reply, with the enclosures of the latter commencing with your letter Nos. M1—H-1-18-22, dated the 19th January last, and the two letters from Pandit Mahesh Chundra Nyāyaratna, may be published for general information in the Calcutta Gazette.

No. 5107, dated Calcutta, the 30th January 1890.

From—Lieut. E. W. Petley, R.N., Port Officer and Shipping Master, Calcutta.

To—The Under-Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Financial Department.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. Mis. 1-H-1-35, dated the 20th instant, and annexure, calling for the opinion of this office in respect of certain proposals relating to the public holidays in Bengal, and in reply to state that it appears to me that the proposal contained in paragraph 29 of the letter of the Government of Bengal Nos. Mis. 1-H-1-18-22 of the 19th idem, will meet the requirements of the mercantile community as represented by the Chamber of Commerce and the Trades Association; but I fear the publication of the proposed double notification will cause hardship to the Government employes who will be deprived of their holidays. My reason for such opinion is based on the following grounds:—

In the six departments and offices which the notification will affect, the bulk of their establishments is composed of Hindus, who usually take this opportunity of visiting their country homes during the Doorga Pooja vacation. These homes, I understand, are mostly ancestral properties, where the social system of the Hindus, being of a patriarchal type, all the relatives, close and distant, of the holders of these properties meet from the different parts of India, and this deprivation of intercourse between relatives, &c., is the hardship which will chiefly be felt, and which concession in the way of leave, &c., at other times, when families are again separated, will hardly satisfy.

No. 75, dated Calcutta, the 3rd February 1890.

From—Baboo Pratapa Chandra Ghosha, Registrar of Calcutta,
To—The Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Financial Department.

I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter No. 1-H-1-34 Mis., dated the 20th ultimo, forwarding copy of letter No. 1-H-1-18-22 Mis. of the Financial Department, with its annexure of draft notification regarding the holidays to be observed in public offices, for opinion and report.

1. In reply, I beg to submit my views on the point indicated in paragraph 29 of your letter scriam.

(1) The publication of the notification, draft of which has been annexed to the letter under reply, will, in my humble opinion, make a clear distinction between public holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act and those notified by executive order only in so far that the exchange banks will remain closed on the "public holidays" only and not on the other days. The excepted offices will, as a matter of fact, be kept wholly open, and although the benevolent special instructions of the Government direct that, though it is not expedient to close them on the days in question, it is hoped that it will be possible to relieve of their duties on those days any ministerial officers whose religious requirements compel them to apply for leave, the heads of departments as a matter of fact will find great difficulty in extending that privilege, exigencies of the service constraining them to refuse the just claims of the poor clerks who cannot force themselves into the notice of the higher authorities without suffering seriously in return. The Government cannot be unaware that it is as much difficult for poor clerks to make their grievances heard as it is for Government to make the heads of departments carry on their business with a portion of their establishment in attendance.

(2) I believe the effect of the publication of these notifications will wholly meet the growing requirements of trade and commerce. It is not for me to remark that whether the mercantile community have proved that they have any real complaint to make. The Negotiable Instruments Act was passed in 1881. And in 1888 and 1889 the Government has been pleased to negative the Chamber's representations because the inconvenience and loss which the mercantile community suffer from the existing state of things, great and serious as they are, cannot be remedied without inflicting a still more serious hardship on a far more numerous though less influential portion of the community. Within this short interval, forgive me if I say no new circumstance has intervened as to justify the reversal of the most noble, wise, and statesman-like ruling the Bengal Government issued in 1889, i. e. last year. In my humble opinion, further enquiries are necessary to ascertain the exact nature of the loss complained of by the mercantile community. The inconvenience arising from the closure of the exchange banks may easily be removed without the direct interference of Government; for, as the constituents of these banks are members of the mercantile community, they may be kept open or close at their pleasure.

(3) I cannot help confessing that the publication of these notifications will not only inflict serious hardship on a considerable section of the community by depriving them of holidays which they now enjoy, but will extend its evil effects not only to the Hindoo community at large but to all classes of population in Calcutta. In these days, when the demonstrative feeling of the community is in its highest tension, a curtailment as indicated by the notification is likely to wake up invidious distinction in the minds of the Hindoo community especially, for within the last couple of years, while the Government has recognised the propriety of closing offices on days of Mahomedan festivals, a backward movement has been evinced in the case of the Hindoo community by the deprivation of the privileges which the latter have been enjoying ever since the British flag was unfurled from the towers of Fort William. For nearly two centuries the Government has not thought it proper to recognise the rights of the Mahomedan community of Calcutta, and the good which the extension of the privileges to that section of the community by closing public offices on Mahomedan festivals is calculated to secure will, I am constrained to admit, be greatly counterbalanced by the unpleasantness which the contemplated curtailment will create in the minds of the Hindoo community. I need not add that such a curtailment will, in addition to the unpleasantness mentioned above, materially injure and inconvenience the public non-trading community generally.

2. The question of the number of public holidays in the Bengal Province has been the subject of much discussion for upwards of a quarter of a century, and although the mercantile community of Calcutta, represented by the Bengal Chamber of Commerce and the Calcutta Trades' Association, have been urging for the last 30 years the desirability of affording greater facilities to the trade by reducing the number of Hindoo holidays observed in public offices, considerations of privations and difficulties to which the general community as well as the clerks would be subjected have always influenced the patriarchal Government in ruling otherwise. The attitude of the Chamber has, however, become stronger every year, and it may be surmised that some inconvenience and loss are sustained by the mercantile community owing to the long Doorga Poojah vacation which under the Negotiable Instruments Act have become public holidays, and that that loss is principally due to the closing of the following offices :—

(1) The Office of Collector of Customs. (2) The Office of Shipping Master. (3) The Office of Collector of Stamp Revenue. (4) The Office of the Stamping Department of the Superintendent of Stamps. (5) The Office of the Salt Rowannah and Opium Sale Department of the Board of Revenue.

3. It will be observed that from the list I have excluded the office of the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, and my reason for doing so I will have the honour to submit further on. It is not for me to say that the customs and habits of the country of adoption of the mercantile and trading community should bear some weight in determining the question of holidays and balance of convenience, nor am I justified to refer in detail to the accommodations already provided for by keeping open the Customs and the other offices, but I cannot help observing that the period of 12 days already fixed for the Doorga Poojah vacation is the minimum to which it can possibly be reduced.

4. The proposal regarding the curtailment of public holidays, as has been set forth in the Government letter, has to be considered in its two different aspects—firstly, in so far as it will affect the general public by the opening or closure of the public offices generally; and secondly, in so far as it will affect them by the opening or closure of the office of the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta.

5. As regards the first side of the question I need not repeat the arguments already before the Government, as they had been put forth by abler and more influential members of the community. As a Hindoo officer and having a certain number of Hindoo clerks under me, and having to deal with all classes of Hindoo and mercantile community of Calcutta, I cannot but record that the Doorga Poojah vacation is already too short. I do not know what interested political pundit has induced the Government to believe that the real Doorga Poojah ceremonies occupy only three days. There is not a Hindoo pundit or layman who can say that the real Doorga Poojah does not extend over a period of more than fifteen days. It commences on the ninth day of the waning moon and ends on the tenth day of the waxing fortnight following. It may be said that there are not many families in Calcutta who observe the ceremony for such a long period—that is to say, who observe the Navamyadi Kalpa; but the same argument may be urged against the “three days” (correctly five days) ceremony, for, as a matter of fact, there are few families who observe even the same. Properly speaking, the minimum observance of the poojah occupies five days, for it commences on the sixth and ends on the tenth day of the waxing moon. But the Doorga Poojah of the Hindoos of to-day is in one sense more important than the great Asvamedha (horse sacrifice) of the Vedic period, inasmuch as the horse sacrifice was observed by the ruling sovereigns only, while the Doorga Poojah (the Asvamedha of the Iron Age) is observed by all classes of people—nay, it is said in the Shastras that it is to be observed by the Mlecchas, Savaras, and all non-Hindoo races; besides, the Asvamedha was a free will offering, while the Doorga Poojah to every Hindoo is a compulsory observance and not to observe it is a sin; and although the actual worship may not occupy a longer period, the preparations, the collections of a thousand and one things for the proper performance of the ceremony cannot possibly be made in a short time. Besides, the five days and nights are fully occupied in observing ceremonies both social and religious. On the tenth day, until the idol is placed in the water, many Hindoo families observing fast do not prepare their food, and many a family invite their friends close upon midnight of the tenth day of the moon and feast together. It is unnecessary to repeat that all the arrangements for sending ladies to their fathers' house or bringing them back to their husbands fall on the nine auspicious days of the Doorga Poojah so well known throughout India as the Navaratri. And last, though not the least, is the ceremony of the autumnal Navanna, a ceremony observed on the income of the new crop, which is pre-eminently directed to be observed in that fortnight of the month of Asvin when the Devi is worshipped.

6. As regards the second side of the question, the office of the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, is not much resorted to by the mercantile community for any urgent or ephemeral or temporary accommodation of business, for, under the Act, such negotiable instruments have been classed under the optional heads. I have not as yet had an occasion to register a single on-demand note, promissory note, hundi, &c., and documents of that nature executed by the mercantile or trading community of Calcutta in course of their business. All such transactions are primarily kept confidential, and the mercantile community loathe to give publicity to such deeds which affect their commercial credit. The only class of deeds for which they resort to this office are of a permanent nature such as leases, mortgages and conveyances, which, under the Act, may be presented any time within four months from the date of execution. Powers of attorney alone of persons abruptly leaving Calcutta not previously arranged may require the Registrar to authenticate during the 12 days' vacation. But the wide distribution of registration offices throughout India and the more liberal provisions of section 33, clause (b), have provided for all such contingencies. It will thus be seen that the closing of the office of the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, is not likely to inconvenience the mercantile community any way.

I beg to append a statement showing the number of registrations effected by merchants and traders and also by the non-trading community of Calcutta during the first 15 days following the expiry of the Doorga Poojah vacation. It will be seen that the table contains statistics of the past 20 years, and the figures in column 3, which show the number of registrations by merchants and traders, fully corroborate the fact that the Calcutta Registry Office is rarely resorted to by the mercantile community of Calcutta during the period which intervenes between the expiry of the 12 days' Doorga Poojah vacation and the re-opening of the Court of Small Causes, Calcutta. I have left out figures for the five years preceding the two decades, as my office records do not show any important transactions by merchants and traders during that period. It will also be seen from the statement that even of the few registrations relating to purely mercantile transactions a good portion were powers of attorney, a class of documents of not an urgent nature, as has already been noticed. Although it is out of place to mention here and in the face of the proposals for curtailment of holidays, I cannot help observing that the office of the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, may be kept closed with the Court of Small Causes, Calcutta, without putting the mercantile community of Calcutta to any the least inconvenience and loss.

NOTIFICATION.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY

THE LAMENT OF A STRICKEN HEART.

BY HELEN IRVING.

I CANNOT smile, though joyous summer flingeth
Her golden radiance over wood and wave,
'Mid all her beauty, I but feel she bringeth
Young flowers, beloved, to bloom above thy grave.

Above thy grave—the couch where thou art sleeping,
Who wert more fair than any flower could be,
They and the angels watch alternate keeping,
Breathing their low, sweet requiem over thee.

On the still night wind through the lattice stealing,
Floats in the quivering melody to me,
But of my sorrowing soul no sad revealing,
Angel or night wind may bear back to thee.

Thou art at rest—and all the anguish rending
The heart erst one with thine, thou canst not know ;
Thine ear hears not the agonized upsending
Of prayer on prayer from out this crushing woe.

Lone is the home whence thy young life hath parted,
Hushed is the air that knew thy love's low tone,
Gone is the light thy starry soul imparted,
Grief's dark'ning veil o'er heart and hearth is thrown.

Waking or sleeping, comes the thought that never Thy hand again in love's warm clasp may thrill,
Thine eye's soft fire shall glow no more forever,
Thy heart's quick pulses evermore are still.

I know, the form that 'neath the sod reposes,
Thou for an angel-glory hast laid down,
And but put off love's coronal of roses,
To wear a radiant and immortal crown.

I know, beloved, thy cherished voice is lending
Its glorious music to the choir above,
Thy soul of light, with kindred spirits blending,
Bathes in the beauty of a heavenly love.

But ah, my world is desolate without thee,
And storm-clouds hide the stars I fain would see ;
Oh, for His holy presence round about me,
To light my spirit on, to heaven and thee!

COMMON SENSE.

By James T. Fields.

She came among the gathering crowd,
A maiden fair, without pretence,
And when they asked her humble name,
She whispered mildly, "Common Sense."

Her modest garb drew every eye,
Her ample cloak, her shoes of leather—
And when they sneered, she simply said,
"I dress according to the weather."

They argued long, and reasoned loud,
In dubious Hindoo phrase mysterious,
While she, poor child, could not divine
Why girls so young should be so serious.

They knew the length of Plato's beard,
And how the scholars wrote in Saturn ;
She studied authors not so deep,
And took the Bible for her pattern.

And so she said, "Excuse me, friends,
I find all have their proper places,
And Common Sense should stay at home
With cheerful hearts and smiling faces."

THE GRAVE.

A FRAGMENT FROM THE ANGLO-SAXON.

(MS. Bodl. 343.)

DEATH.

A House was built for thee,
Ere thou callest dust thy Brother ;
A mould was shapen for thee,
Ere thou camest from thy Mother ;—
Its height is not known—
Its depth is not measured—
'T is locked by no stone,
Till thy bones therein be treasured,
Until that I bring thee
Whence thou shalt part never,
Until that I measure thee
Thy clay-bed forever !—
Thy house is not built high,
Nor lofty thy chamber,
Yet therein thou well canst lie,
Though lowly that chamber,—
Its sideways are lowly—
Its heelways are narrow,
Yet therein thou well canst lie
In that dim house of sorrow.
The roof is built over thee
To thy breast full nigh ; wearily
There shalt thou dwell, in cold,
Darkly, and drearily.
Doorless is that dread House—
Darkness dwells in it.
Death keeps, for aye, the key—
Fast art thou bound in it—
Loathly is that Earth-House,
And grimpest to dwell in—
The worms shall divide thee,

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Yet thou shalt dwell therein—
 There shalt thou yet be laid—
 And leave thy friends near thee.
 Thou hast no friends ;—afraid
 They'll never come near thee,
 To ask how it liketh thee,
 That dim house of sorrow,
 Or ope the door, to ask for thee,
 After to-morrow.
 For soon thou growest loathly,
 And hateful to look upon,
 And soon from thy forehead
 Thy locks fall one by one—
 From thy ringlets their fairness
 Is scattered, no finger
 Shall pass through their smoothness :—
 None near thee shall linger.

IT is said that all the Catholic bishops and cardinals will meet at Rome in the spring, to discuss the position of the Church and the question of a successor to Pope Len.

THE Eastern Guardian hears that Mr. C. Kunhi Kanan, late Deputy Collector of Malabar, sentenced to two years' imprisonment for bribery and corruption, has been set free and is now at Calicut.

THE Madras Railway has commenced to run third-class carriages specially constructed with latrine accommodation for female passengers. When will the East Indian Company introduce the reform?

MESSRS. Petty and Co. (Silver-town, London) have, it is said, been able to prepare castor oil free from its characteristic odour and taste. The London Medical Journal certifies that it has not the slightest odour of castor oil and that it possesses a bland, pleasant taste.

IT is reported from Toth-Aradacz, in Hungary, that a stone shaft from heaven weighing eighty pounds fell and forced open a spring of water. It was truly a godsend, for the neighbourhood had been badly in need of good drinking water. An Anglo-Australian who has a collection of such curiosities has purchased the aerolith for £200.

WE take the following Hyderabad news from Our Own Correspondence column of the Advocate of India of July 28. The letter is dated Hyderabad (Deccan), July 24 :—

"Heretofore the topic of conversation was the Sowar Commission. Now the name of Abdul Huq is on the lips of every one. With the concurrence of the Resident, the Nizam's Government has decided to institute legal proceedings against Sirdar Abdul Huq for the recovery of the large amount he obtained from the Deccan mining concessionaires. A meeting was held at the Residency on Sunday last, and the question was discussed there in the presence of three leading officials of the Nizam's Government. Sirdar Abdul Huq has arrived here, and naturally all sorts of rumours are rife about his visit.

The Shaukat-ul-Islam, an Urdu weekly, had a leader the other day on the doings of the Director of Public Instruction, Mr. Syed Hussain Bilgrami. The Shaukat denounces Mr. Bilgrami's measures in very strong terms. The article has created quite a sensation here. A correspondent contradicts the Shaukat in the columns of the Safa-i-Deccan, the leading Urdu paper here. It may not be out of place to add that the Safir, which is now the only daily in the Deccan, [is] edited by Mr. S. M. Mitra, a Bengali gentleman from Calcutta, who read Persian and Urdu at Lucknow, Agra, and other centres of Mahomedan literature.

We have amongst us a Hindoo swami who has travelled from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin, and has besides, visited China, Japan, Ceylon, and Russia. It is worth noticing that he went all the way to Russia by the land route during the troublous days of 1879. He has always been a vegetarian. In Russia he was the guest of Dr. Nishikanta Chattopadhyaya, late Principal of the Hyderabad College. At the request of the Hindu public the swami has very kindly consented to deliver a lecture on his experiences as a traveller. He speaks English fluently.

We have now amongst us the Rev. Rajab Ali. This gentleman is a native of Peshawar, and, as the name will show, was born a Mahomedan. He is now a Wesleyan missionary. He has in the press a work in Urdu on the administration of Hyderabad and the principal families of the State, including the Paigah, Salar Jang, and the Peshkar family."

An Arabic name is no more evidence of Mahomedan birth than an English name is guarantee of British birth.

This Mahomedan Wesleyan seems more of a political litterateur, if not a publishing hack, than a missionary.

A travelling Swami who speaks English fluently, must be an interesting character. But it is nothing surprising that a Hindu religieuse has always been a vegetarian.

A. M. MORELLETT has found that suddenly dipped in boiling glycerine, vulcanised india-rubber becomes non-vulcanised, that is, its parts can be readily united and it dissolves in the common solvents of caoutchouc. The glycerine must be boiling at the moment of contact.

HERE is a mermaid story :—

"W. W. Stanton, mate of the schooner 'Addie Schaeffer,' now lying at the Market House Dock, Jacksonville, while fishing for bass 300 miles off St. Augustine, drew in his line, and found entangled therein the strangest fish, if it is a fish, that has ever been caught. This strange creature is about six feet long, pure white, and scaleless. The head and face are wonderfully human in shape and feature. The shoulders are well outlined, and very much resemble those of a woman, and the bosom is well defined and shows considerable development, while the hips and abdomen continue the human appearance. There are four flippers, two of which are placed at the lower termination of the body, and give one the impression that nature made an effort to supply the strange creature with lower limbs. Mr. Stanton confesses to quite a fright at first sight of his queer prize, which, on being drawn on board, gave utterance to a low, moaning cry, which might easily have been mistaken for the sobbing of a baby. It is extremely unfortunate that Mr. Stanton did not succeed in keeping the creature alive, which he thinks might have been done, as the strange object lived two days after being taken. The schooner has been thronged daily by curious visitors, who express much wonder and astonishment at the strange object. Mr. Stanton, after visiting several ports and showing his queer creature, will donate it to the Smithsonian Institution. The fish, or mermaid, is in a large six-foot glass jar in alcohol."

BRITISH power is being firmly founded. The Sessions Judge at Quetta has capitally sentenced Sirdar Sher Khan, a man of consequence on the frontier, on a charge of murder of Sher Mahomed. There is great sensation in consequence and an attempt is being made to procure a reprieve.

HERE is an instance of commercial morality which is exceedingly rare in these hard—and "fast"—times. We read:—

"A large European firm in Bombay discovered that in its transactions with a certain railway company, it had unwittingly cheated. The transactions were all over, and there was no probability that the Railway people would ever come to know the true state of the case. Messrs. A. and Co. however drew up a cheque for Rs. 17,000 and sent it to the company as the sum that should have been paid but for the trickery of an up-country agent of theirs whom they dismissed."

This was the usual thing among native merchants, before the invention of stamp and registration and scientific codes.

LADY Lansdowne left Bombay on the 18th July and reached Aden on the 26th after a protracted and extremely rough voyage.

MR. Seymour Keay, M. P., is expected at Hyderabad shortly, to return in time for the Session in November.

MR. A. O. Hume will leave London by the Peninsular line on the 4th October, reaching Bombay towards the end of the month. Having finished his business in connection with the Congress, he hopes to be able to leave at the end of March.

THE Administrator General's Act, II of 1874, as amended by Acts I of 1879, IX of 1881, and II of 1890, has been extended to the whole of Upper Burma, excepting the Shan States.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

SOUTH America seems in the full swing of one of her periodical fits of civil commotion and bloodshed. Our readers are already aware of the Revolution in the Amazonian land of Brazil. She packed off to Europe the Emperor she gave her. The revolutionary spirit is wonderfully catching and is making itself felt in the adjoining states, all peopled by Indo-Portuguese or Indo-Spaniards. There has been a revolt in the Argentine Republic, originated by the military. It was aimed principally against the President Celman and his corrupt practices. It commenced with fighting in the streets of Buenos Ayres in which many persons were killed. The President fled to Rosario and the rebel government was proclaimed. The Foreign Ministers mediated, the Government troops were reinforced, the President reappeared from his hiding place, but the insurgents insisted on his resignation. They entrenched themselves with artillery in the Retiro quarters of the town, the Government fortifying the Plaza Mayo facing Government House. A general amnesty followed. It was at one time reported that M. Celman had resigned and M. Pellegrini been appointed President and quiet restored. That news was, however, contradicted. The latest advices spoke of continuous firing until the rebels had exhausted their cartridges. The resignation of the President was doubted, but the insurgents had yielded and rebellion was suppressed. Another telegram confirmed the restoration of peace, and the surrender of the rebel squadron, giving the total loss at a thousand killed and five thousand wounded, and announcing the decision of the Chambers suspending payment of the state's obligations for a month. This peaceful news was immediately followed by that of rioting in the country districts and the tearing up of the Southern Railway. All, however, is quiet at Buenos Ayres. The Banks have reopened. A conciliatory cabinet is being formed and M. Celman continues as President.

An insurrection too has commenced against the President Barillas in Guatamala. It is feared, that the troops will join the Salvadorians who are advancing and a decisive battle is shortly expected. The telegraphic communication with the Argentine Republic and Guatamala is suspended.

The United States Government begin, from the 13th, purchasing silver under the new law which has raised the price of the metal, to the joy of the exporters and grief of the importers in this country.

The cry against the sentences on the Grenadier Guards has not been unheeded in the proper quarters. The Duke of Cambridge will reconsider the orders with a view to remission.

The six new Indian Civilians have been entertained at dinner at the Northbrook Club.

Severe cholera is reported from Mecca.

THE House of Commons has passed the Bill for the cession of Heligoland. During the debate Sir James Fergusson admitted that a portion of the commerce from the African mainland would be diverted to German ports, but it has been arranged that the Germans would gladly welcome any British Indians who might be tempted to settle there.

LORD Cross is anxious that the Indian Councils Bill be passed this session. The second reading in the Lower House was fixed for Thursday, but it had to be postponed until after Supply. It may if feasible be taken up during the stages of the Appropriation Bill. Mr. Bradlaugh stigmatised the tactic as a breach of promise.

THE Uncovenanted Service Committee propose that the paying of pensions to civilians resident in Great Britain be at a minimum of one shilling and nine pence per rupee, that a portion of furlough count as service towards pension, and that the age of twenty instead of twenty-two count for pension service. They are not, however, prepared to recommend any distinction for Engineers. Sir John Gorst has announced that the new rules will not have retrospective effect.

THE Wandering Jew must work out his primeval curse to the bitter end. He is that abject thing, that anomaly in creation, who defies the philosophy of Walter Scott and boldly faces the Poet's self-complacent question,—

Breathes there the man, with soul so dead,
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land!
Whose heart hath ne'er within him burned,
As home his footsteps he hath turned,
From wandering on a foreign strand!

and boldly proclaims, Behold! I am the man! He is not only without a country but without even a resting place pro tem. The Czar has issued an ukase expelling all the Jews from the country districts and ordering them to live in Ghettos—wherever or whatever that may be—in towns, thus by one stroke—a single scratch of the quill—rendering a million of the chosen people homeless. They are further excluded from all liberal callings.

Alas! for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun!
O! it was pitiful!
In a whole Empire full,
Home they had none.

WE are glad to notice a proper utilisation of the Rampore hoards. The Council of Regency has been advised to provide the capital estimated at half a crore of rupees for a railway line from Bhoj-pura, on the Rohilkhand and Kumaon line, to Rampore and Moradabad, the Bengal and North-Western Company undertaking the construction.

THERE is a movement for abolition of the Simla Municipality. Can the summer capital be above that needs of modern civilization, or are the municipal rates too heavy to be borne with easy enjoyment of life up in the hills?

IT is no small evidence of progress in these days that the value of European medicine has penetrated malarial belt and dense forest up the hills to the great independent principality in the North. The Nepal Durbar has recognized the need of a public hospital. On the 9th July one such was opened at Khatmandu with some ceremony, in the presence of the Minister and the British Resident. It is, we believe, intended to give relief of all kinds.

THE educational destitution of Indore having attracted the notice of the British authorities, we are glad to notice that the Maharaja is exhibiting signs of attention to the subject. He is going to start a College towards which a monthly grant of Rs. 2,500 has been sanctioned. This institution will teach up to the M. A. standard of the Calcutta University, with which it will be affiliated.

It is reported that Sir Mortimer Durand is not returning till the Government goes back next year to Simla, with which view he will obtain extension of leave to March 1897. At the same time, the rumour having been revived of Sir Stuart Bayley retiring shortly, the Foreign Secretary is named one of the three candidates for succession, the others being Sir David Barbour and Mr. Mackenzie, Chief Commissioner, Central Provinces. All first class men, though the two latter only have adequate civil experience. The first would suit the Punjab better.

VERILY, the Annexation is abroad—as at home, in the Archipelago as on the Continent. After his late return from London, Raja Brooke of Sarawak has annexed Limbang, the largest and richest of the Provinces of the Raja of Brunei, on plea of misgovernment by the latter.

THE Maharaja of Indore had invited the Europeans to a grand ball at his Lal Bag Palace on the 26th July, towards which His Highness had sanctioned Rs. 30,000. But it could not take place owing to a death in the ruling family. There is great disappointment in consequence in European society in Central India. But it could not be held. There is mourning in the whole state. The deceased was no other than the reigning Prince's younger brother, Bala Saheb Yeswant Rao. He was a young man of great amiability as well as education, which he originally received at the Rajkumar College, under the late Abernethy-Mackay, the "Ali Baba" of Anglo-Indian Literature. The Maharaja Holkar showed every brotherly solicitude for his recovery, removing him to quarters near his own residence in order the better to be able to look after him. But notwithstanding all the care taken, his fever could not be combated, and the young Prince at last died in the morning of the 24th, two days before that fixed for the ball.

The Maharaja Holkar doubtless appreciated his brother's innocent and retiring disposition. In an atmosphere of intrigue, the young Prince kept himself free from it. Many were the attempts made by the interested to embroil him, but in this he always showed a firmness apparently foreign to his character. The country will be a loser by the loss of so fine an example.

When Sir Lepel Griffin ruled in Central India as Agent to the Governor-General, he obtained the Maharaja's sanction to a monthly allowance of one lac between Bala Saheb and his mother Maharani Radha Bai. It was never paid, because it would not be received on the condition which was tackled to it, of enjoying it out of Indore Territory. A most honourable refusal. Good and gracious as they were, pliant to a degree, abstaining religiously from cabals at court or family feuds, loyal to the Maharaja, and agreeable to every wish of His Highness, neither mother nor son would consent to expatriation. Notwithstanding the associations of mammon-worship amid which they had been brought up, they spurned the humiliating offer to put money in their purse at the price of self-effacement as Indorees. They would leave their country under nothing short of state coercion. To the credit of the Maharaja, the patriotic citizens were not disturbed.

To the Bala Saheb's young widow and the Dowager Maharani, Radha Bai, his mother, we beg to offer our sympathy.

UNDER our head of News and Comments will be found a Hyderabad letter reproduced from another source. It calls for some additional remarks.

Sirdar Abdul Huq is now one of the millionaires of Bombay where he lives as a prince, independent of the favour of princes and ministers, and free from their anxieties. He is naturally a mark for the jealousy of his former fellow Durbarees.

What is the cause of the dead set against the Syuds of Belgrami? Is it because at a court of Loot they have not touched any? Or is Bceotia wroth with the man who by creating out of nothing and organising out of chaos a department of Education, threatens its very character?

IN a contest for the Trades Challenge Cup under the Association rules, the Babus of the Shobhabazar Football Club, last week, beat the first team of the East Surrey Regiment by three goals to two. It is satisfactory to find that the Babus are going in for manly sports, but they should not make too much of the present triumph, which may have been accidental. That does not prove the masculine strength or muscularity of the Babu above the European. The name of the institution, we are afraid, is not handsome. To begin with, it is a misnomer. If our young gentlemen would be wedded to locality and are enamoured of the Bazaar, why, then there is every reason to prefer the good and excellent Bow to the vain Shobha. It is more Bowbazar than Shobhabazar.

So Harimohun Maiti must wash out his crime of rash lust on his child wife Foolmoni, by a twelvemonth's residence in No. 1, Chowringhee. He was already familiar with the place, for attempting a fraud on a neighbour. He challenged many European jurors, preferring to be tried by his own peers or countrymen. But his young advocate, without counting on the temper of the Bengali jurymen, essayed his rescue from the grasp of the law by fastening the guilt of his client on the customs of the country. This audacity the Bengali gentlemen of the jury resented. They, we understand, requested the foreman on their behalf to give a distinct denial to such imputations, which the maladroit foreman did not convey to the Judge. Maiti was charged under four different counts, namely, with culpable homicide not amounting to murder, voluntarily causing grievous hurt, causing death by a rash and negligent act, and causing hurt. He pleaded not guilty and denied that he had any intercourse with Foolmoni on the night preceding her death, although he had had several connections before. The Jury guided by the Judge's eminently impartial charge found Maiti guilty under Section 338 of the Indian Penal Code, of causing grievous hurt by doing an act so rashly or negligently as to endanger human life, and Mr. Justice Wilson sentenced him to one year's rigorous imprisonment. The penalty laid down in the section is two years' imprisonment, of either description, or a fine of one thousand rupees, or both. So it was not a lenient punishment by which the Judge marked his disgust for the brutality of a husband of 36 on an immature wife of 10. Mr. Wilson is strong in these cases, and thoroughly British. He thus directed the Jury as regards the law in the case:—

"His lordship did not propose to do what he thought was dangerous, and give any universal and abstract definition of words used in law which the framers had not minutely defined. The wiser course would be to try and define and explain these words so far as was necessary for the purposes of the particular case before them. With regard to this case, he would tell them that if they were of the opinion that the accused caused the death of the girl, or further, if they were of opinion that the act was in itself dangerous, and further, that the act done was of such a nature as to indicate reckless indifference of the welfare of the girl, or a want of reasonable consideration about what the man was doing; if they thought the act was one which the husband, and the husband of a girl, if he had any reasonable regard for her welfare, and exercising reasonable thought of the act he contemplated, he would have refrained from doing it—the jury would be justified in finding him guilty of doing a rash and a negligent act."

He was judicial throughout. He would not import into the case the question of social reform raised out of it by some of the newspapers:—

"The case did not involve a question as to what was the proper age of marital intercourse, or what was the best test of fitness or unfitness for intercourse: that was a matter which was not for them to decide."

The guilt of the prisoner therefore rested on the condition of the girl—Was she in a state to receive the violence offered? If the section has been rightly applied, it applies to all cases irrespective of age of the wife. The condition and not the age of the wife and the conduct of the husband are material factors in the determination of the Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Vicissitudes of climate, exposure and hardships, tell heavily on soldiers and sailors, sowing the seeds of diseases which may ultimately break up the constitution. Naturally careless of their health a word in season may avert many evils, and may cause them to resort to timely measures without any difficulty or publicity. Holloway's effectual remedies are so suitable, and are so easily adapted for the varied complaints to which our soldiers and sailors are liable, that a supply should always be obtained before proceeding abroad. It may with confidence be stated that many a valuable life might have been saved, or confirmed cripple prevented from begging in the streets, if Holloway's remedies had been used in time.

guilt of the husband. The moral of the trial is a warning to all under the dominion of the Indian Penal Code, whosoever they may reside, not to use their marital rights rashly or negligently so as to endanger human life.

Here is the Judge's justification for invading the secret chamber of husband and wife :—

"To bring the law of the question to bear on the evidence in this case on the various charges framed against the prisoner, his lordship thought he must begin by asking the jury to give their careful consideration to distinguish between certain branches of the law, which had no connection with this case, and that which had connection with the case. The branch of law which had no connection with this case was that relating to rape. Rape constituted the offence of having intercourse with a female against her consent and when by the law she was not of the age to consent. In the case of a married female, as the jury probably knew, the law of rape did not apply as between husband and wife after the age of 10 years. But it by no means followed that because the law of rape did not apply between husband and wife after the wife had attained the age of 10 years, that it could be supposed that the law regarded the wife above 10 years as 'being made over to be the absolute property of the husband, or as a person outside the protection of the criminal law. It was not the law, and had never been the law, his lordship thought, under any system with which the Courts have had to do in this country, whether Hindoo or Mahomedan, or that framed under the authorities of the British rule—it had never been the rule that a husband had an absolute right to enjoy the person of his wife without regard to the question of her safety. If the circumstances were such that it was certain death of her, or that it was probably dangerous to her life, there is no absolute right to her husband without proper restraint on the husband of which the law takes care. The law is exceedingly jealous in all rights of the law. The law is exceedingly careful not to trespass inside the chamber of husband and wife, and never does, except in cases of absolute necessity; but as had been said before, the criminal law was applicable where the facts were such as to bring the case within the purview of the criminal law. His lordship was not aware of any recent case in this country in which such matters have had to come under the notice of a criminal court, but in earlier times there were reported cases in the Sudder Nizamat in which the husband was punished for having intercourse with his wife, she being unfit and immature."

We are truly grateful for such a declaration from the highest Court in the Empire, and we are sure the whole respectability of the Hindu community will bless the true Dharm Avatar whose dictum will be the protection of the weaker sex from the violence of the stronger, in the most momentous relation of the two.

All the same, we cannot help confessing some lurking doubt as to the technical accuracy of the view. It is scarcely consistent with the law that allows a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. In fact, that law requires amendment.

HER Majesty has created Prince Albert Victor, after his return from, and in reward apparently for, his arduous voyage to India and sight-seeing through the Empire, "Duke of Clarence and Avondale." That is all right—at any rate, quite in accordance with precedent. It does not take long or much for children of the Blood to win titles and even renown. In some strictly monarchical countries they have born Generals and Admirals—though these may not all prove Heaven-born warriors on land or sea. We now find the creation interpreted as a graceful compliment paid by the Queen to, above all, the subject who, in the opinion of many loyal citizens, is essaying heart and soul, might and main, to cause the virtual dismemberment of Her Majesty's dominions—Mr. Parnell. Avondale is the name of the great Home Ruler's Irish estate, from which he himself derives his title of "Master of Avondale." Thus is the compliment made out by loyal publicists. We confess this is beyond our loyalty or common sense. Had Her Majesty created Mr. Parnell Duke of Avondale—a capital idea, by the way, worthy of a Cæsar, which could not fail to have the most important political effects—we might understand. As it is, it looks like an unfair swamping, not to say niching, of the poor Irish squire's humble distinction.

THE glory of the unfortunate Great Eastern is about to be eclipsed, if, as is said, the Americans are going to construct a steamer, over a quarter of a mile in length, with accommodation for 10,000 passengers, to be propelled by electricity, which will run from Sandy Hook to Liverpool in thirty-six hours, keeping railway time despite storm or fog.

They have performed many a feat in engineering, and we doubt not their capacity, but is the game worth the candle? Their things are not usually "tip top," they having a sneaking leaning to Brummagem and the fictitious. But as in talk so in other matters, they have a fondness for the tall and the prodigious. If volume be a necessary element in sublimity, they are the sublimest people on earth: they certainly beat all nations in the love of amplitude and vastness. Accordingly, they delight in Empire-Cities, monster hotels and theatres, mammoth shows, colossal statues. But whatever they put their hands to, they never forget to ask themselves, Will it pay? After the disappointment of the builders of the British Leviathan of the deep, we cannot suppose any business man will rush after another and a much greater monster of mechanical ingenuity and labour in the same line. Is electricity already dirt cheap? At any rate, it ought to be more extensively employed as a motive for ocean vessels before it was tried on such an enormous scale. So far from its use being common, we have not yet a name for the new vessels. We have no end of steamers—where are your, say, electrimers? After all the mechanical and material conditions are fulfilled, the prohibitive practical difficulty will remain—how to find the ten thousand passengers for each voyage? On the whole, we are inclined to dismiss the announcement which is going the round of the press as a piece of the yarn characteristic of trans-Atlantic journalism.

THE Paper Currency Act, 1882, provides for the retention of the coin and bullion received for currency notes as a reserve to pay these notes, excepting a sum not exceeding six crores of rupees as may be fixed by the Governor-General in Council with the approval of the Secretary of State, such coin or bullion being investible in securities of the Government of India. Since 1877-78, such investment is at its maximum six crores, whereas the total note circulation has largely increased. In 1877-78 the minimum was Rs. 11,13,00,000; in 1888-89, it rose to Rs. 14,82,00,000; in 1889-90 it swelled to Rs. 14,96,00,000; and on the 7th July last it was as high as Rs. 18,00,00,000. It has, therefore, been thought desirable, with the acquiescence of the Bombay, Calcutta and Madras Chambers of Commerce and the approval of the Secretary of State, to increase the limit of investment from six to eight crores of rupees. Accordingly, the Finance Minister Sir David Barbour has introduced a Bill to amend the Act. The mover thinks that if the Government err at all, it is on the side of caution rather than that of rashness, and believes that there will be no opposition to a measure which is well within the limits of safety and which will ultimately add eight lacs of rupees yearly to the public revenue.

FOR the last two weeks, the Sujjada Nashin—the Pontiff—of the famous Mahomedan shrine at Ajmere has been in Calcutta. His name is Dewan Syud Ghyasooddeen Ali, and the title of Shaikh-ul-Mashaikh has been conferred upon him by His Excellency the Viceroy. He is a lineal descendant of the celebrated Mahomedan saint, Khajah Moenooddeen Chishtee, who died at Ajmere about six hundred years ago and whose remains lie buried in that shrine—one of the most magnificent mausoleums of India. This tomb is an object of the greatest veneration amongst the Mahomedans throughout India, and thousands of pilgrims from all parts of the country proceed there in all seasons of the year, but on the occasion of the Anniversary of the saint's death, the gathering is prodigious. The shrine is held in great reverence by even the Hindoos, and is visited by many of them. Readers of Indian History need not be reminded that the great Emperor Akbar went to Ajmere from Agra, all the way on foot, by short marches, on a pilgrimage to the saint's tomb. The Sujjada Nashin is in enjoyment of valuable Jageers not only from the Emperors of Delhi but also from the Nizam of Hyderabad, the Maharajah of Jeypore and others.

He is a guest of our townsman Nawab Abdool Luteef, and has made a very favourable impression upon those Mahomedan gentlemen here, who have visited him.

He had been to Dacca, where he stopped for a week or two, as the honored guest of Nawab Sir Abdool Ghunny.

THE Begum of Bhopal has, we hear, just purchased two of the buildings of the late King of Oudh, at Garden Reach, for a lac and ten thousand. This purchase must have been made with the express sanction of the Foreign Department, for, if we remember aright, Her Highness, when she was in Calcutta some years ago, entered into negotiations with the owner of Mr. Peacock's house in Russell Street, for the purpose of purchasing it, but Government refused to give their sanction to the purchase, probably on the ground that it was not convenient to allow Independent Chiefs to become owners of landed property in British India, and thereby become mixed up in lawsuits in our ordinary courts.

UNIVERSITY SCANDALS AND THE REGULATIONS OF THE CALCUTTA UNIVERSITY.

SOME of the affiliated institutions of the Calcutta University have been caught tripping. When writing, last week, on the moral havoc worked by the University regulations for attendance, we had no idea that our remarks would receive such prompt verification. Not that breaches of regulations were not of frequent occurrence nor of the widest notoriety, but the University habitually shut its eyes and ears to them. It would take no cognisance of them without formal and specific complaints. Such complaints, however, are not easily made. A feeling of delicacy and personal dignity would deter most people from taking up such a position. No respectable man would relish the idea of being an informer. For the rest, violations of the University regulations were probably not confined to one or two institutions, and a sense of common interest sealed the mouths of all. Fellow-feeling makes us wondrous kind. As for outside people, they had scarcely a sufficient motive for mixing themselves up with unpleasant matters. There are, besides, obvious difficulties in their way. Things must indeed have come to a serious pass to have at last roused the University from its lethargy. Some complaints of a specific kind have at last been made, and according to a report that has appeared in the papers they have been enquired into with the result that two of our Colleges have been found guilty. The following is the story of the Hindoo Patriot :—

"A serious complaint was made against the Ripon College by the authorities of a rival College. The charge was that the Ripon College granted a certificate of attendance to a habitual absentee, who went up to the last B. L. Examination and gained a high place in the University list. The student who brought such 'honor' to the College never attended its lectures, and yet managed to secure a certificate of attendance required by the University regulations. The Syndicate appointed a Committee to investigate the charge. The Committee found that the charge was not without foundation. The Syndicate has disaffiliated the erring College, in law, for one year. Some 'shady transactions' were also brought to light with regard to another College. It has escaped, we hear, with a heavy censure."

That story, circumstantial as it is, is not all true, we are afraid. At any rate, the denouement is premature. Certainly, no order of disaffiliation has been passed. The matter is still under consideration. The statement that the enquiry is due to a complaint from a rival College is also, we believe, incorrect. The complaint was made by a passed candidate who stood third in order of merit at the late B. L. examination. He urged his claim to the Gold Medal awarded annually to the highest in order of merit at this examination, on the ground that he was a bonâ fide student, while the two who stood above him and for whose success with such distinction the Ripon College had received so much credit never attended lectures. It was this which led to the appointment of a Committee of Enquiry. Before this Committee the authorities and records of other Colleges were, indeed, examined upon incidental issues, and this may have given rise to the impression that the enquiry was at the instance of another College.

Without any wish to defend the accused Colleges, we cannot help remarking that the vigor now displayed by the University is in marked contrast with its past attitude of indifference in regard to such and similar evasions of its regulations. That indifference is not a little responsible for the prevailing laxity. The Minutes of the University bear witness that it had been apprised of these things, of course, in a general way, before this time. But it declined to take any action, unless furnished with specific allegations. One such complaint was, we understand, made by the Principal of the City College against one of the very Colleges that have now been found in fault, without eliciting any enquiry. The complaint was not even forwarded to the College complained against, for a report. The University may say that it only showed proper regard for the dignity of its affiliated institutions by the course it adopted in the case in question. It will nevertheless be asked, Had it no inkling of a state of things that was already a thing of general notoriety and that was serious in all conscience? If so, all the worse for a body that is so ready to lay down regulations which it has no means for enforcing. The Department of Education has prescribed a body of inter-school rules and it has an Inspecting agency to see to their observance. The University keeps no such agency for tracking out offences against its rules, nor apparently cares to note how far they are obeyed, nor will it listen to complaints when they are made, on the score of their being vague and general. All this is symptomatic of an easy-going disposition. This insouciance is not unnaturally interpreted into a desire to wink at evasions or violations of rules. At any rate, this is the popular interpretation, and it has certainly emboldened the parties and stimulated the practices which are, rather late in the day, being threatened with censure and disaffiliation.

The University may possibly have very good reasons for its past attitude. That attitude may be regarded as one of dignified non-interference, although it does not strike us as a policy of masterly inactivity. No doubt, the appointment of a regular agency for the detection of violations of its rules would scarcely be consistent with the dignity of the University itself or that of the Colleges. The very idea of espionage and of police surveillance in the hallowed domain of liberal culture is revolting. Nor is the encouragement of general complaints a desirable thing from even a business point of view. But what we urge is that its regulations should not be of a character to require a detective agency, or to give rise to evasions against which there must necessarily be complaints. They should not be such as to provoke a spirit of resistance in those who are affected by them. The University should not interfere too much with the internal economy of its subject institutions. Nor should its laws be too many or too complicated. They should avoid entering too much into details and, above all, they should not unnecessarily fetter the discretion of Heads of institutions in matters like the selection of candidates. Holding this view, we think the framers of the early bye-laws of the University were wise in avoiding the temptations to detailed interference. Those bye-laws were sufficiently general, and left a proper degree of discretion to the authorities of schools and Colleges. They might have been open to abuse now and then. Discretion is always liable to abuse, but there is no help for it. Abuse of discretion is a lesser evil than dishonest evasion of impracticable limitations. One of these limitations to the discretion of school-authorities, requiring them to certify to the "reasonable probability" of Entrance candidates passing the Examination has proved a fruitful source of mischief. Hundreds of candidates with no chance of success have been, year after year, sent up with only the effect of swelling the revenue of the University and compelling the Headmasters of schools to give false certificates. The governing body of the University could not be ignorant of the falsehood of such certificates, but they winked at the fact until, in a year of an abnormally high percentage of failure, it was forced on their attention by a clamorous public opinion. They reconsidered the form of certificate, and, instead of expunging the impracticable clause and simplifying the form, they made the thing worse by introducing what are doubtless regarded as guarantees and safeguards against lax interpretation of the clause in future. The practical effect will be, as every body else knows, that where one falsehood was committed before, there will henceforth be a pack of recorded lies.

The rule requiring from candidates, at the higher University examinations, an attendance at 66 per cent. of the lectures in each subject is one which could have been conceived in only pedagoguish brains. In all probability, it has its origin in personal reminiscence. A Professor of History finds it hard to make his lectures sufficiently interesting: there is a stampede amongst the students the moment his turn comes. It is certainly very irritating to have to speak to all but empty benches, specially if the poor occupant of the chair does his best to make his lectures attractive. Failing to draw, he can bethink himself of nothing better than to compel reluctant attendance by procuring the passing of a regulation like the one under consideration. The tendency to keep away from lectures should certainly be checked. This tendency is now-a-days on the increase. The students rely too much on "coaches" and examination manuals and other instruments of cram to care much for the help of the recognised teachers. From all points of view, this is an evil which should be discouraged as far as possible, but the remedy should be sought in other ways than by the passing of hard and fast regulations. On the other hand, it should not be forgotten that attendance is at best but a mechanical test of knowledge. There may be students, attending from year's end to year's end, who never come to any good, while others, prevented by illness or other equally unavoidable causes from attending the prescribed number of days, may yet be superior to them in point of merit. To exclude these on the score of their being short of the rigid standard of attendance by ever so small number of days, is a great hardship. Amongst these, there may be poor students, to whom a year's exclusion from the examination may really mean exclusion for ever. There is another aspect of the question. The test of attendance may, after all, be thoroughly fallacious. In the overgrown size of College-classes in these days, a species of immorality has come into vogue which cannot be easily checked, namely, that of getting oneself marked present in the register by proxy. This single fact ought to be enough to make the University hesitate in insisting on a test which, in reality, possesses little value. Indeed, the case resolves itself into one of much ado about nothing. It is a perfect farce when, for an object of such problematical importance, a number of registers has to be kept involving a large amount of clerical labor and of expenditure of vocal energy on the part of the lecturers who call the registers—all, to find that their registration has no statistical value. The absurdity of the rule is made clear by other facts. The roll-call is by no means an easy affair in these days of unwieldily large classes. A quarter of an hour is the least time required to finish it. It entails a severe strain on the lungs—a strain further increased by the noise which cannot be prevented during the operation. To make the calls audible enough, one must pitch his voice to a high key, and this expenditure of energy represents so much loss of the power which should be carefully reserved for the main work of teaching. One would think this were too much of a terrible ordeal to go through once in the day to make the prospect of its repetition at all agreeable. But, under the present regulations, this must be repeated a number of times in the day, to the virtual diversion from study of one-fourth of the hours set apart for this purpose. Altogether, it is a most curious regulation which can only be worked at a serious sacrifice of time and energy, without any adequate advantage. This, coupled with the more serious hardships it entails on meritorious students unable, for no fault of their own, to complete the required attendance, ought to clinch the argument against its retention. The sooner it is withdrawn, the better for the good name of the University and the legitimate interests of all concerned.

THE DOORGA POOJA HOLIDAYS.

THE success of the mercantile agitation for the reduction of the Dooorga Pooja holidays is a striking instance of indomitable British energy. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce was determined to succeed and it has succeeded—by simple persistence. It was only in December 1889 the Chamber was told by the Government "that the inconvenience and loss which the mercantile community suffer from the existing state of things, great and serious as they are, cannot be remedied without inflicting a still more serious hardship on a far more numerous, though less influential, portion of the community." Words could not more plainly convey a refusal, but their effect upon the Chamber was only to stimulate its resolution. It went to work with redoubled energy. In a week after the receipt of this apparently final reply, a deputation from the Chamber, consisting of Sir Alexander Wilson, Mr. Wylie, Mr. McCaw and Mr. Stuart, waited on the Lieutenant-Governor at Belvedere. This interview was the turning point in the history of the question. Influence and personal pressure at last prevailed where argument had failed. "The numerous, though less influential, portion of the community" were lost sight of in the presence and personality of the small deputation. The Belvedere interview was a happy hit, and it told. Since that event, the attitude of the Bengal Government underwent a complete change. In fact, the case had already gone ex parte against the holidays. One glimmering hope, indeed, remained, in the opposition of a portion of the mercantile community themselves. The Exchange Banks stood out for the holidays, and this was a fact which could not be brushed aside summarily even by an accommodating Government or an accomplished Secretary. These Banks plainly hinted that the majority of the mercantile community were not in favor of the reduction, and said "that it has not been effectively demonstrated, by a general vote or otherwise, whether reduction of holidays finds favor or disfavor among the majority at the present time." The Lieutenant-Governor was thus confronted by a division in the camp of his protégés, and the way this difficulty has been got over shows which side the wind now blew. The Chamber was, indeed, called upon to set the doubtful point at rest by taking a formal vote. This the Chamber declined to do, for reasons which have not been given. The Committee of the Chamber only curtly replied that "they were unable to comply with the suggestion of the Government." They must have had good reasons for not trying. However, by way of strengthening the hands of Government which piteously called for help, they got an informal vote somehow or other passed unanimously on the occasion of the Chamber's Annual Meeting. No notice, be it remembered, was given to the members that the question of the holidays would come on for such a disposal. The value of an expression of opinion so procured may be appraised without much difficulty. Yet it was deemed sufficient by the Government of Bengal. The native community would have probably been content to rest the question on the point raised by the Exchange Banks and already accepted by the Government. But even this source of satisfaction is denied. The Chamber refuses to put and, the world may not unfairly take it, shrinks from putting the question to the only fair test of a majority of votes, and the good Government of Sir Stuart Bayley has only satisfaction to express in return for the Chamber's rebuff. Mr. Secretary Cotton is a courageous Knight of the quill and, after his recent escapade, he has need to plunge in desperate services to prove his loyalty. He puts a good face on the matter thus: "Although, as stated in my letter to the Chamber, it would have been more satisfactory to Government to have received an official reply as to whether any considerable minority of their members was opposed to any change, the Lieutenant-Governor has no doubt that the expression of opinion of the members of the Chamber on the occasion of their Annual General Meeting may be accepted as conclusive proof of the views of an overwhelming majority of the mercantile community of Calcutta." After this, the fate in store for the dissents of the other public bodies, and of some individuals, consulted by the Government on the subject, may be easily imagined. The reasons assigned by the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Indian Association, and the British Indian Association are set aside as being nothing new. New reasons on an old and threshed out matter are not so easy to create, while the fact must remain that those very reasons had, until now, their weight in the long protracted agitation on this subject of over thirty years.

The Lieutenant-Governor's sudden zeal for mercantile interests finds other incidental expression. His Honor would not allow a holiday even on the great day of Doorga Poojah Eve—the Sasti. Even the paid Kala Pahar of the Government of Bengal—the great iconoclast himself, who would have been better dubbed Shums ul Olema than Mahamahapadyaya, spared this day. But, evidently from an amiable wish to overwhelm the Chamber of Commerce with unexpected favors, Sir Stuart ran his pen through this day expressly retained in the list of the Pandits. This, however, has not escaped the discerning eye of the Viceroy. Lord Lansdowne has, with his usual consideration for the subject race, in terms of official courtesy asked the omission to be supplied. He has done more. With a touch of statecraft worthy of admiration, he suggested the removal of the Christmas Eve from the list of holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act, to leave the total of holidays under the Act intact. A little act of religious impartiality like this goes a great way to conciliate the people. The Viceroy's attitude on the general question is also marked by great sympathy for those who are politically precluded from the exercise of personal pressure on an alien government. Evidently, his Lordship has given his sanction to the proposals of the Local Government with the greatest reluctance. The evil done will work all the same, though.

Both the Lieutenant-Governor and the Viceroy are anxious that the effects of the reduction upon the Hindu employes in Government offices should be minimised as far as possible. His Lordship endorses the Lieutenant-Governor's remarks on the subject and says:—

"The Governor-General in Council accepts the proposals of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor as regards the offices under the Government of Bengal to be kept open during the holidays which will henceforth not be notified under the Act. In all these offices special arrangements should be made, by contracting the hours of business, by limiting the work undertaken to what is really urgent, by granting leave to Hindu employes wherever practicable, and by utilizing as much as possible the services of their non-Hindu fellow-clerks to minimise the inconvenience which may be felt by those who have hitherto enjoyed close holidays on the days which will in future be open. Under proper arrangements, so far from hardship being entailed on any considerable section of the community, not more than three or four Hindu clerks under the Government of Bengal are likely to be affected by the change. Separate orders to the same effect will be given by the Government of India in regard to the offices directly subordinate to it which are situated in Calcutta."

These remarks are conceived in a thorough spirit of consideration. They are no doubt meant to sweeten the pill. The grievance, however, of Hindu clerks in mercantile employ is practically beyond any palliatives. It depends on the demeanour of their own masters, and the future will show where the present measure will culminate.

MONGHYR.

Junalpoore, 30th July 1890.

The local municipality has been working for sometime past without a chairman of its own, owing to the retirement of Mr. Strachan, the late chairman. All the European Commissioners too have resigned. It is at present managed entirely by natives, consisting of the Bengalee and Behari Commissioners, headed by Babu Doorlup Chunder Mozoomdar, the Vice-Chairman. Recently, an election took place by which a Bengali clerk attached to the Locomotive Department, E. I. Railway, was voted to the chair. Both Bengali and Behari Commissioners were present and voted, and although the Beharis by far outnumber the Bengalis, one of the latter people obtained the majority of votes, and the said Babu was elected as chairman. The matter is exercising the community. The rate-payers are some for and others against the result. There is even a talk of memorializing the higher authorities with a view to annual the election, and to appoint a suitable chairman in place of the elect, meaning a European of course.

A European by name Parsons, P. W. Inspector, employed in the E. I. Railway at Luckeserai, committed suicide at his residence the other day. He tied a bed sheet round his neck and attaching it to a rope, by which a meatsafe was suspended, let himself drop to the ground, whereby the bed sheet tightened round his neck and strangled him. The cause has not been ascertained, but the deed is attributed to excessive drinking.

The people are suffering from the effects of the damp weather. It has been raining cats and dogs incessantly day and night, right through, for some days past. The river has risen unusually high, causing the low lands to be submerged, to the destruction of the crops.

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS IN BENGAL.

No. M1-H-2 16, dated Calcutta, the 21st April 1890.

From—H. J. S. Cotton, Esq., Offg. Secy. to the Govt. of Bengal, Financial Dept.,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Dept. of Finance and Commerce.

I am directed to submit, for the consideration and orders of the Government of India, a copy of the correspondence which has passed between this Government and various local Associations and Offices regarding the notification of public holidays in the Bengal Province.

2. The history of the question is given in my circular letter of the 19th January to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce and other Associations. The holidays notified under the Negotiable Instruments Act in Bengal are now exactly the same as those which were sanctioned by the Government of India on the 29th October 1867. Although the Chamber of Commerce have not ceased to press for their reduction, their representations have, with reference to the orders passed by the Government of India on the 28th January 1880, and reiterated in 1882, been invariably rejected by this Government. A copy of the reply sent by the Lieutenant-Governor to the Chamber of Commerce in 1888 was transmitted to the Government of India with my letter No. M1-H-17, dated 17th September 1889. A copy of a correspondence with the Chamber in 1889 is among the enclosures now submitted. In the orders issued by Government on that occasion it was pointed out that the reasons adduced by the Government of India in 1882 against any reduction in the number of holidays were in full force, and the following extract from your letter No. 3712, dated 12th September 1882 was quoted:—

"The Governor-General in Council is aware that the closing of the Government offices in Calcutta for a period of 12 days is productive of some inconvenience to the mercantile community, but on the other hand it cannot be overlooked that, in the words of the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal the inconvenience and loss which the mercantile community suffer from the existing state of things, great and serious as they are, cannot be remedied without inflicting a still more serious hardship on a far more numerous though less influential, portion of the community."

3. A new suggestion has, however, now been made, which it is believed will be able to satisfy the reasonable requirements both of the European commercial body and of the Hindu community. When the holidays for the current year were notified under the Negotiable Instruments Act by Government, a deputation from the Chamber of Commerce waited on the Lieutenant-Governor at Belvedere in December last, and strongly pressed upon His Honour the necessity of modifying the form of notification by which public holidays were gazetted. The deputation laid stress on the alteration which the passing of the Negotiable Instruments Act had introduced into the conditions of the problem since the decision of Government was arrived at ten years ago, and indicated that it might be found possible to find a solution of an admitted difficulty by restricting the number of holidays gazetted under the Act, but at the same time retaining by executive authority the existing number of holidays for all public offices save the few which are indispensable to the foreign commerce of the port. The question thus stated was then very carefully considered by the Lieutenant-Governor, and the result was the issue of the circular letter of the 19th January, to which I am to request that a reference may be made by the Government of India for a résumé of the discussion as well as of the arrangements it is proposed to adopt. His Honour's views are so fully expressed in that letter that it is not necessary to enter again upon the subject at any length.

4. Briefly speaking, it is now proposed to notify holidays in Bengal under two separate notifications: first, in regard to public holidays notified as such under the Negotiable Instruments Act; and, secondly, in regard to holidays which are notified as such by the closure of public offices. These two separate notifications would be in the form given and apply to the days specified in the draft notifications annexed to this Government letter of the 19th January.

5. Before publishing these notifications or applying to the Government of India for permission to modify the form in which public holidays are notified in Bengal, the Lieutenant-Governor desired that the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Calcutta Trades' Association, the British Indian Association, the Indian Association, the Bank of Bengal, the Exchange Banks, and the Heads of the Offices immediately concerned, should be consulted; and it will be seen from the replies which form an enclosure to this letter that the proposal has elicited considerable difference of opinion. The Bengal Chamber of Commerce, the Bank of Bengal, the Trades' Association, and the Board of Revenue give it their concurrence. But the letter from the Exchange Banks accords only a hesitating and incomplete support. The managers of these banks would evidently prefer to retain intact the holidays notified under the Act. They express themselves as perfectly willing to accept the proposals put forward by Government, if only the majority of the mercantile community is in favour of them. But they observe that "it has not been effectively demonstrated, by general vote or otherwise, whether reduction of holidays finds favour or disfavour among the majority at the present time." Looking to the importance of this question, the Lieutenant-Governor deemed it right to transmit the letter of the Exchange Banks to the Chamber and to consult the Committee again on the subject. Accordingly, upon the 17th February, I was directed to inform the Chamber that although the Lieutenant-Governor had no doubt that the opinion of the Chamber as a body had been expressed in the letter already received from their Secretary, yet, with reference to the observation made by the Exchange Banks, it would be more satisfactory to Government if, with the permission of the President and Committee, it could be stated approximately how far the doubt expressed by the Banks, "whether a majority of the (mercantile) community is in favour of fewer holidays," can be set at rest by reference to the relative number of supporters of either view among the members of the Chamber. In reply to this letter the Committee intimated that they were unable to comply with the suggestion of Government that a formal vote of the Chamber should be taken on the question; but on occasion of the Annual Ordinary Meeting of the Chamber, the President, Sir Alexander Wilson, referred to the subject in his address, and in the course of the proceedings called for an informal vote as an expression of the Chamber's opinion. The result is reported to have been the unanimous confirmation of the views expressed by the Committee. The list of gentlemen present at this meeting is given in Mr. Clarke's demi-official letter of the 7th March, and it appears to the Lieutenant-Governor to contain as complete a representation of the mercantile interests of the port as it could be possible to assemble together for such a purpose. Although, as stated in my letter to the Chamber, it would have been more satisfactory to Government to have received an official reply as to whether any considerable minority of their members was opposed to any change, the Lieutenant-Governor has no doubt that the expression of opinion of the members of the Chamber on the occasion of their Annual General Meeting may be accepted as conclusive proof of the views of the overwhelming majority of the mercantile community of Calcutta. This opinion is in accordance with the views expressed by the Bank of Bengal, the best judge of the requirements of the commercial public, by the Trades' Association, and by the Committee of the Chamber, during a period of agitation for thirty years.

6. On the other hand the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, the Indian Association, and the British Indian Association are opposed to any change in the method of notifying the existing holidays. Their letters are enclosed, and are entitled to the consideration they deserve as undoubtedly representing the great mass of Hindu opinion on the subject. But the Lieutenant-Governor does not find that they bring forward any new arguments or raise any objections which have not already been met by anticipation and fully replied to in my letter of the 19th January. The British Indian Association are, indeed, prepared to admit that the Currency Office and Shipping Office should be kept open during some of the holidays along with the Custom House. The National Chamber of Commerce and the Indian Association are not willing to make any concession. Their apprehension is, as the National Chamber of Commerce puts it, that the Government proposals are "but the thin end of the wedge, which in time must bring about the total abolition of the Doorga Poojah holidays in all public offices."

7. With reference to this remark, I am to explain that the objection of the native associations appears to be based in a large measure on a misconception of the arrangements proposed by Government. The effect of a notification under the Negotiable Instruments Act is that Promissory Notes or bills of exchange do not mature on the holidays therein specified, but are deemed to be due on the next preceding business day, and it is complained by the mercantile community that business is to a large extent paralysed when there are twelve such holidays in succession. There can be no dispute of the justice of this complaint and of the great inconvenience which the present procedure affords to the commercial public. The great increase in the number of steamers visiting the port, and the consequent necessity of expedition in despatching them, has also largely augmented the inconvenience caused by a twelve days' continuous closure of the offices to the trade of the port. To remedy these grievances, it is proposed that the number of holidays under the Act should be reduced; but it is not proposed that the number of holidays in Government offices generally should be diminished, and the executive order which it is intended to issue sufficiently shows that they will continue to be closed for the same period as at present. Nor will the promulgation of these parallel orders produce any perceptible effect upon the general body of the Hindu community. Certain social festivals of the Hindus will be placed on the same footing as Mahomedan holidays. But in both cases reasonable facilities will be afforded by Government for carrying on business. This is now done in the case of Mahomedan holidays and ought to be done in the case of Hindu social festivals. On the other hand, certain Mahomedan holidays are now granted by executive order, and are, as a matter of fact, universally enjoyed in all parts of Bengal except in certain specified offices at the Presidency. The opening of these particular offices does not in any way govern the practice elsewhere, and we may expect that certain Hindu holidays, if notified in the same way as Mahomedan holidays as days upon which certain offices in Calcutta will be open, will be accepted in exactly the same way as Mahomedan holidays are now accepted.

8. The view which the British Indian Association appear to hold that the holidays under the Act should not be altered, but that by executive order the holidays in certain offices should be reduced, does not in any way meet the difficulty of which the commercial community complain. The opening or closing of a particular public office (important as it is that the offices should remain open) does not so much impede the transaction of public business as the declaration that for twelve days in succession exchange bills receivable cannot be legally collected, and Promissory Notes payable cannot be legally paid. The only manner in which this difficulty can be met is by reducing the number of holidays notified under the Act. And this is what it is now proposed to do without at all interfering with religious prejudice. The proposals now made declare that all days necessary for the performance of religious ceremonies shall be holidays under the Act. The remaining days of the Doorga Poojah, which are devoted to social festivities, are no longer included in the category of such holidays: but in order to allow every possible concession to the claims of Hindu clerks who are employed in public offices, it is proposed to declare by executive order that these offices, with a few specified exceptions, shall remain closed as they are at present. A distinction is drawn between holidays notified under the Act and those declared in public offices by executive order, and it seems to the Lieutenant-Governor that, by the recognition of this clear distinction, a compromise has at last been found, in the only way in which it was possible to find it, which satisfactorily meets the reasonable claims of the Hindu community as well as the interests of trade and commerce.

9. The Registrar of Calcutta and Shipping Master are opposed to the exclusion of their offices from the holidays notified by executive order, but in the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor the arguments adduced by these officers are of no validity. The commercial community have always objected, and with reason, to the closing of the Registration Office for twelve consecutive days; and although, as represented by the Registrar, the number of documents presented for registration at this season is likely to be considerable, it is apparent from this fact that a small establishment will be sufficient for carrying on the work, and that the hardship of attending office will therefore be felt by very few. The Shipping Office is one which, in the interests of the Port, it is absolutely necessary to keep open on every day on which it is possible to do so.

10. The Lieutenant-Governor has the strongest sympathy with the very general desire of the Hindu community that no obstacle should be placed by Government in the way of its Hindu employes meeting together at their homes, at the season of the Doorga Poojah holidays, for the celebration of religious, social, and domestic ceremonies. It is far from His Honour's desire to encourage any policy which would deprive Hindu employes as a body of the satisfaction of enjoying their great annual festival in the future as they have done in the past. There is nothing, however, in the proposals now made which, in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion, is likely to lead to any such unfortunate result. It is true that a few clerks employed in a few offices may be subjected to some inconvenience by being required to attend office on days on which they now get a holiday. But the inconvenience is one which they must bear in the public interest. They will enjoy some compensating advantages. And it is not to be forgotten that in all places in Bengal, and especially in Calcutta, the Doorga Poojah holidays are the season of the busiest life in all the year. The shop-keepers have no holiday, the cloth-sellers, the money-changers, the confectioners, the grocers and the general dealers are busy all day long; in the bazar there is no holiday, but business is as brisk as it can be. The clerks and sircars in the bazar are not idle men. It is only in the public offices that stagnation reigns. It is not therefore a real or just ground for complaint if in a few public offices for public reasons a few clerks are required to attend office on certain days which are allowed to remain holidays to the great majority of clerks employed in the public service.

11. Having regard to the correspondence with the Government of India on the subject of holidays in Bengal on previous occasions, the Lieutenant-Governor does not wish to take action in the direction now proposed without the previous sanction of His Excellency the Governor-General in Council. I am now to request that this sanction may be accorded and permission given to publish the draft notifications which are the annexure to my letter of the 19th January. It will be seen that the opinion of the law officers of Government has already been obtained that there appears to be no legal objection in the way to prevent the Government from cancelling the notification of public holidays already published at page 1010 of Part I of the Calcutta Gazette of 11th December 1889, and substituting in its place a new list.

12. I am to add that the executive order of the Government of Bengal, under which the public offices under this Government (excluding those specified in the notification) will be closed during certain days of the Doorga Poojah holidays in the same manner as these offices are now closed on the occasion of Mahomedan festivals, will obviously have no force in regard to offices under the Government of India, and the Lieutenant-Governor would therefore venture to recommend that the benefit of similar orders may be extended generally to the offices under the Supreme Government employed in the Lower Provinces. It will no doubt be necessary to exempt certain offices from the effect of such an order, as has been done in regard to offices under the Bengal Government; and in the opinion of the Lieutenant-Governor, as intimated in a separate letter of this day's date, the Currency Office should be so exempted; but it may easily be arranged that in these offices, as in the exempted offices under the Government of Bengal, if it be found impossible to grant the Hindu employes their holidays during the excluded days of the Doorga Poojah festival, they should not be required to attend in larger numbers than are actually necessary for the transaction of business, and that other concessions in the way of leave at other times should be given to them.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY

SONNETS ON SICILY.

I.

Not those I envy who from cups of gold,
Round which a carver's cunning hand hath wrought
Fair fantasies of earth's awakening thought,
When warm her blood was, and fancy bold,

Quaff wine of fame and virtues manifold,
Whence poets in their feasting moments caught
More glorious madness than Apollo taught,
And loves the Muses' lips had left untold.

Not these I envy, for my feet have trod
The ground of Sicily, my eyes have seen
The sands and bays where Galatea sung,

The deathless mead in which uncrowned and young
Proserpine played, witless of that sad God,
And fields where no flowers blow, no grass is green.

II.

Here from this stony ridge where shepherds stray,
A host whose thoughts were firm, whose hopes were keen,
Looked down on Syracuse, the Dorian Queen,
Defiant, an invulnerable prey ;

Here through their lines Gylippus forced his way ;
And in that chasm where towers and masts are seen
Confused with golden air and wave serene
Imperial Athens torn and bleeding lay.

Ah ! here indeed the hand of mortal things
Touches, and Pity haunts us for their lot
Who change the nobler for the meaner aim ;

Here yielded to the vulgar fate of kings,
She who in worlds where Rage and Death come hot
Had built, nor knew it, an immortal name.

Times of India.

A STILL DAY IN AUTUMN.

I love to wander through the woodlands hoary,
In the soft gleam of an autumnal day,
When summer gathers up her robes of glory,
And, like a dream of beauty, glides away.

How through each loved, familiar path she lingers,
Serenely smiling through the golden mist,
Tinting the wild grape with her dewy fingers,
Till the cool emerald turns to amethyst—

Kindling the faint stars of the hazel, shining,
To light the gloom of autumn's mouldering halls,
With hoary plumes and clematis entwining,
Where o'er the rock her withered garland falls.

Warm lights are on the sleepy uplands waning,
Beneath, dark clouds along the horizon rolled,
Till the slant sunbeams, through their fringes raining,
Bathe all the hills in melancholy gold.

The moist winds breathe of crisped leaves and flowers,
In the damp hollows of the woodland sown,
Mingling the freshness of autumnal showers
With spicy airs from cedar alleys blown.

Beside the brook and on the ambered meadow,
Where yellow fern tufts flake the faded ground,
With folded lids beneath their palmy shadow,
The gentian nods, in dewy slumbers bound.

Upon these soft-tinted lids the bee sits brooding,
Like a fond lover loth to say farewell ;
Or, with shut wings, through silken folds intruding,
Creeps near her heart, his drowsy tale to tell.

The little birds upon the hillside lonely
Flit noiselessly along from spray to spray,
Silent as a sweet, wandering thought that only
Shows its bright wings and softly glides away.

The scentless flowers in the warm sunlight dreaming,
Forget to breathe their fulness of delight,
And through the tranced woods soft airs are streaming,
Still as the dewfall of a summer night.

So in my heart a sweet, unwonted feeling
Stirs like the wind in ocean's hollow shell,
Through all its secret chambers softly stealing,
Yet finds no words its mystic charms to tell.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment.—Bilious affections, with all their concomitant annoyances induced by atmospheric changes, or too liberal diet, should be checked at once, or serious consequences may ensue. When any one finds his ideas less clear than usual, his eyesight dimmed, and his head dizzy, accompanied by a disinclination for all exertion, physical or mental, he may be quite sure that he is in immediate need of some alterative medicine. Let him at once send for a box of Holloway's Pills, a mild course of which will remove the symptoms, and speedily renew his usual healthful feeling. If the bowels be irritable, Holloway's Ointment should be diligently rubbed over the stomach and liver every night and morning.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

A FOOT-NOTE at the bottom of the race cards of an up-country meeting, at the close of last season, ran thus :—"Any person bringing a dog to the race course will be shot!" meaning any dog brought by any person, and not the person, we presume. It is easier to Break Priscian's head instead of Britons'.

The Secretary was no "classical Baboo"—or unclassical, either.

EDISON, who for the last dozen years has taken the shine of all the edifiers of man in the mysteries of Nature and thrown into the shade their most marvellous inventions, is determined to out-Edison himself. He is now engaged on an instrument for seeing distant objects, by the aid of which a man in New York will distinctly recognise a friend in Boston. It will be ready by 1892.

At the hearing of Lord Dunlop's petition for divorce the other day, a witness, Wood, deposed having seen Lord Albert Osborne, then in Ceylon, toss with petitioner, who should sleep with Lady Dunlop, and the former won. Well might Dilke say, there are as bad fish in the sea as out of it.

THE enquiry extending over four months into the Hindu-Mahomedan riots at Belgaum has at length ended. Thirty men were arrested by the police for rioting, and the magistrate has committed twenty-seven to the Sessions on charges of rioting, murder, &c., releasing three.

OUR people are becoming civilised—in no becoming way to our antiquated mind. They are following—at a respectful distance—the Go-ahead of the West. The dastardly outrage lately reported in the Indian Mirror in equivocal, if alliterative, terms as a "case of mortifying a Brahmo Somaj Missionary," reveals a novel and rather alarming phenomenon in our society. We are told

"The melancholy affair took place over the conversion of two youths against the will of their relatives. These waylaid the Missionary, and got him into an empty house. Here they put a garland of shoes round his neck, and plastered his cheeks, one with lime, and the other with ink, and drove him into the street."

That is a "mild Hindoo" apery of the trans-Atlantic pastime of tar-and-feathers.

ANOTHER Western crime of a far more serious kind is reported by a correspondent of the East writing on the 27th ultimo. Although described as a very daring dacoity attended with two murders committed last week in the village of Hijuli, close both to the Manick-gunge Thanna and sub-divisional Headquarters, it has all the appearance of a Jew murder in Eastern Europe in a community exasperated by grinding and pauperising usury. The facts are thus given :—

"One Ram Kormakar and his wife were found dead on the courtyard of their house and their iron chest and wooden trunk were found all opened from which all the valuable articles, cash money, account papers and bonds were taken away. There were no marks of violence on their bodies but their necks were firmly tied round with cloth. This shows that they were both strangled to death by the culprits. There was no one else in the house except the poor husband and wife. It is said that the deceased was the owner of a large sum of money and his profession was money lending. They had no children nor any servant to attend them. The local police is trying hard to bring the culprits out."

THERE is a pretty quarrel at Hyderabad between two European military officers in the State Service over the death of a native Christian cook. The Deccan Times informed the world that the man Lazar was done to death and secretly buried by Lieutenant Rowe. On the appearance of the paragraph, Colonel Neale, the Commandant of the Paigah troops, a brother-in-law of Lieut. Rowe, telegraphed to the latter to return from Poona where he had gone on short leave, while he requested the City Commissioner of Police to institute a police inquiry into the matter. The paper was called upon for the name of the informant, which was given. The police on inquiry declared the charge against Lieutenant Rowe unfounded. Lieutenant Rowe also published a letter denying the accusations and attributing Lazar's death to diarrhoea from excessive drinking, the liquor for which was supplied him by Captain Sayce, Commandant of the Minister's Body Guard. On the day of appearance of this letter, Captain Sayce informed Colonel Neale that he had obtained leave for three months and asked permission to leave immediately. He was told to wait till the leave of absence was officially communicated, the Colonel not yet knowing anything of it. Captain Sayce, however, did not wait. Without making over charge, he left the same evening for Dera Dun, and remained at Mussoorie for three months. He has now returned to be suspended by order of the Minister. On his side, it is said that Captain Sayce saw the Minister's order granting him leave before he left Hyderabad. He also professes his ability and determination to prove the charges he preferred against Lieutenant Rowe.

ACCORDING to the Deccan Times of Aug. 2, the sale of the Salar Jung horses and carriages, last week at the Nizam Club in Chudderghaut, fetched only Rs. 20,000. How many twenty thousands the Jungs had paid in buying up the equipages of others going on furlough or retiring!

WE read in the same paper :—

"The Nizam's Government have extended for a further period of four years the sole right granted three years back to Signor Cauzio, an Italian gentleman, grandson of Garibaldi, to erect a grining factory in the Aurangabad district. The Government have further advanced him a sum of fifteen thousand Government Rupees to extend his factory, which amount is to be repaid in four yearly instalments."

We have great respect for red shirts, and coats, for the matter of that—and we know nothing of this new factory. Only, we are afraid there is far too much grining—metaphorical if not literal—and grinning—in the sleeve or on—already in the dear Deccan, to allow us to look with unconcern on the addition of another concern of the same ilk. But God is great. Long live the Nizam!

A PARSEE Khansama named Dadabhoj Rustomjee in his employ while living claimed a large sum against Sir Salar Jung II when dead. The Committee of Administration have satisfied the claim by payment of about Rs. 1,700. The Committee have been authorised to call witnesses, and they are now sitting regularly three days in the week. We hope they will be able to reduce the amount of the alleged debt very considerably.

SYED Mahamed Belgrami, the Deputy Commissioner of the Inam Department at Aurangabad, goes to England to study agriculture. He has obtained special leave for the purpose and will besides receive £300 a year from the Nizam's Government.

THE Director of Public Instruction in the Nizam's Dominions in his last report thus compliments Raja Murli Manohar :—

"I cannot close my remarks on the Nobles' school without placing on record the service done to the cause of education by one of its oldest pupils—Rajah Murli Manohar Bahadur. He is one of the brightest products of our system. Belonging to an old family of high State officials, he has assimilated what he has learnt and made excellent use of it, in trying to benefit his fellow castemen and fellow citizens. He has opened and maintains a well-attended school at his own expense for members of the Kayasth community which is numerous and influential in Hyderabad. He has found a gymkhana in the city for tennis, polo, tent-pegging and other manly sports, and there are few open competitions in which he or his colleagues do not take an active part. Although he has passed no examination—not even matriculated—the training he received at school has made him an active man of business, and an accomplished gentleman."

The Raja has since founded "a Hindoo Sanscrit school, where "vads, Sanscrit Grammar and Sanscrit prose and poetry will be taught." The school has just been opened with 40 Brahman boys, who will receive their education free.

THE Rajah of Anagoondy near Bellary had been to Hyderabad on business. He is a tributary chief under the Nizam, paying a samasthani or state revenue of Rs. 22,000. He has lately been saddled with a peshkash or nuzzurani of Rs. 19,000, besides being relieved of his private revenue of about Rs. 10,000.

CAPTAIN Ravenshaw, Cantonment Magistrate, Secunderabad, has sentenced one Chinnappa, for rape on a girl of tender years, to three years' rigorous imprisonment and a fine of Rs. 100 with the alternative of 6 months' additional imprisonment. If an appeal lay to our High Court here, Mr. Justice Norris would probably have enhanced the hard labor on the brute to 7 years, and possibly remitted the fine.

THE Tejnarayan Jubilee College, Bhagalpur, has been affiliated to the Calcutta University in Arts up to the B.A. standard and in Law.

THE Indian Railways Act (IX of 1890) has been declared to be in force in the Tarai parganas in the dominion of the Lieutenant-Governor of the N.-W. P. and Chief Commissioner of Oudh.

THE Cantonment Magistrate at Nowgong has been made to be ex-officio Assistant to the Political Agent in Bundelkhand.

THE European Vagrancy Act, IX of 1874, sections 4 to 9 and 19, 20, 24 and 29, has been, from the 31st July 1890, declared to be in force in the dominions of the Nizam of Hyderabad. Will this extension relieve the dominions of all the European vagrants?

WE read :—

"A Defamation case of some interest has just been decided at Delhi by Pundit Somdat, Magistrate of the 1st class. It appears that two men named Bulaki and Karim Bux, municipal contractors, were called upon by Mr. J. S. Aldwell, Sanitary Inspector of Delhi, to alter certain objectionable drainage arrangements, and made a report to that effect to the Municipal Board, who called upon the contractors for an explanation. These men wrote on the back of the report that it was false, and that the Inspector was in the habit of making false reports like this, insinuating that the 'cause of the displeasure between the reporter and accused and his family will be fully explained to any officer who will be good enough to inquire about it.' Upon this Mr. Aldwell brought a charge of defamation against the accused. Pundit Somdat delivered judgment last Monday, sentencing Karim Bux to pay a fine of Rs. 100, or in default two months' simple imprisonment, and Bulaki to pay a fine of Rs. 25, or in default one month's simple imprisonment."

THE next half-yearly departmental examination of Assistants and others in the Chittagong division will begin on Monday, the 6th October next. There will be two centres, one at Chittagong for the examinees employed in that district and the districts of Noakhally and the Chittagong Hill Tracts, and the other at Comilla for the Tipperah examinees.

THE Earl of Ava, 17th Lancers, eldest son of the late Viceroy, shortly proceeds to England to re-join his regiment at home.

WE condole with the Maharaja of Hutwa on the death, from epilepsy, of his son and heir. The loss is not confined to the Maharaja's household. Behar itself must feel it too, seeing that the chief Houses there are generally childless.

THE Calcutta Bar has sustained a loss in the death of Mr. M. P. Gasper, one of the ablest advocates. He had been ailing for some time, and was ordered a change of climate. But he was not three hours out from Suez when he breathed his last.

THE pious are given, we know, to singing—psalmody, but the Indian Messenger seems to dance in delight over the good cheer—with liquor drawn from the inexhaustible municipal hydrants—at the entertainments, cheap and plentiful, to which the Calcutta Congress delegate is being treated. One of these is thus described :—

"The Indian Association entertained Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjee at a banquet in oriental style at the rooms of the Association on Friday last. There was an influential gathering, many of the distinguished citizens of Calcutta being present. It was from beginning to end in a truly national style. No healths were drunk, and there were no after-dinner speeches, but the absence of these formalities rather added to the heartiness of the occasion."

We thoroughly understand it. After-dinner speeches would have spoiled the game for most of us. There is no damper to the appetite like a call to "orate." There would surely have been a stampede had a sudden announcement been made at the outset that such a torture was in store. Only the principal guest of the evening could do justice to both the dinner and the after-dinner "function." He is preeminently endowed with the gift of the gab—in the Scotch sense of the word. He would dumbfound Baboo Jugdanand Moukerjee who, the other day, lavished his naïve admiration on the gormandizing powers of the editor of this journal. Herein, as in his energy, he is truly British, however much he may otherwise be an Oriental of Orientals. For the load of work and cares, responsibilities and ridicule he has borne, he is a very Atlas. But even our wellknown compatriot is not big enough to carry a whole dinner for a large assembly all in his hold, nor fiery enough to consume it quickly in his anatomical furnace. Hence, we suppose, there was no call for postprandium exhibitions upon the innocent wights who attended no less to satisfy their inner man than to do honour to the Conquering Hero—who did not conquer.

THE Elwes—we beg pardon of the family, we mean the millionaire—of Anglo-India, has at last been forcibly parted "for good" from his money-bags. He is said to have left about a million sterling, principally in Government securities and partly in landed property in several districts. How he lived or what use he made of his means, we are not permitted by the law to say, any more than to inquire how the heirs of this vast fortune fared during their parent's protracted sojourn.

THE Indian Mirror used to be distinguished for the length and breadth of the headings of articles. It has been beat in the South, where one of the newer native papers has an article or leaderette of not full 36 lines capped, by way of title, with the following peremptory pronouncement :—

"A SPECIES OF MUNICIPAL OPPRESSION MUST NOW CEASE!"

The sentiment is accurate, whatever the case of the sentence.

A MORNING contemporary has, in the absence of more popular topics, been treating its readers to discourses in science. It published on Sunday a paper by Sir Andrew Wilson on the "Spleen and its functions." This was followed up with a leader on Thursday. We may notice the subject hereafter. Meanwhile, we would draw the learned writer's attention to a queer statement of his. What does he mean by "the scientists of the times of Pope and Wordsworth?" Were these poets contemporaries?

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

AFTER our notice last week of the Imperial ukase for expulsion of the Jews from the country districts, we were glad to find immediately the order declared to be unfounded. That, at any rate, shows that in certain high quarters such an exercise of authority is not deemed the right thing. Notwithstanding, the Exodus of Israel from Russia has already commenced. The Central News Agency on the 8th reports that the Jews are quitting Russia in thousands, in consequence of the new laws, and are proceeding to Brazil and Algeria.

ORDER has been completely restored in the Argentine Republic. President Celman has resigned and M. Pellegrini appointed in his place. A new ministry has been formed and the people are represented thoroughly satisfied.

THE Uncovenanted have won another concession. The improved rate of 1s. 9d. will apply to pensions granted during the present financial year. They cannot be too grateful to Mr. Jenkins for the happy denolment of this Parliamentary romance.

A WHOLESALE strike has commenced at Cardiff. The passenger traffic with South Wales has ceased. The mails are being sent by road. The Men's Committee insist that a working week shall be no more than sixty hours which the Companies refuse to agree to.

VALUING the friendship of Great Britain, the Volksraad has accepted the Anglo-Transvaal Convention upholding the autonomy of Swaziland with a joint administration of Boers and English for the Whites, and allowing the Transvaal to receive the port of Swaziland with the right of railway thereto.

THE Anglo-French agreement arising out of the Anglo-German Convention has been signed. As a set off against the British Protectorate over Zanzibar, there is the French Protectorate over Madagascar and the extension of the French sphere of influence up to Lake Ichad.

KEMMLER, sentenced to death two years ago, was tortured to death at New York on the 6th instant by electricity. Death was not instantaneous. Three shocks were given, the man breathing after each shock. Life was not extinct before several minutes had passed.

EMPEROR William has revisited England. He arrived at Dover on the 3rd instant and proceeded to Cowes next morning. He was received most cordially at Osborne. On the 6th, he crossed over to Southsea to witness a shamfight at Eastney—the new method of attack under cover of smoke.

CHOLERA is still raging at Mecca. It has broken out as fearfully at Jeddah too. The deaths are given at both the places at one hundred a day. There has been a death from the same disease at Madrid.

The fate of this year's pilgrims to Arabia is most sad, from every point of view.

SPEAKING at Birmingham on the 2nd, Mr. Chamberlain lamented the persistent obstruction of the Opposition in the House of Commons, the contempt to which Parliament is being brought and the destruction of its power with the people. But that is the abuse of Party Government, if not a necessary evil of Government by Public Meetings governed by a majority of votes.

THE agitation against the Indian Councils Bill has so far prevailed that Mr. Smith, on the 5th, announced in the House that it would be abandoned for the present session. Woe to India! Othello, however, is to be congratulated on the maintenance of his occupation.

NOW that the present session of Parliament is towards its close, the Viceroy of India is free to take his projected trip beyond the pale of civilization. On account of a heavy landslip near Bagi, the small party did not leave on the 7th, postponing the start to next day.

THIS year the rainfall along the outer range of the Western Himalayas has been excessive. At Naini-Tal, from the 19th July for a full fortnight, the fall was uninterrupted and measured a continuous 44 and 50 inches at the west and east end registering centres of the lake. Since 1880, the year of the great landslip, Naini-Tal has not been visited by such a heavy downpour. The wind, however, was not violent. The tonga road between Katgodam and the Brewery and the bridle road between the Brewery and Naini-Tal are impassable, while the Ballia Bridge has been swept away. The actual registers at Simla, Murree, Mussoorie, and Ranikhet are respectively 11'31, 3'54, 2'24 and 15'14 inches more than the average, namely, 37'72, 16'70, 14'19 and 35'39. There have been several slips at Simla. The Mashobra Road was blocked for two days, the short road to Annandale is impassable. A house in the Bazaar collapsed, killing two men.

AT Darjeeling too, it has rained methodically since April. The place is dull and wet, and landslips have interrupted the running of the railway line.

THE plains have suffered no less, from the floods. There have been breaches on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway between Bisharatganj and the Ramgunga bridge. A correspondent from Bareilly writes to a contemporary :—

"It is impossible to describe the state of the surrounding tracts of land. You have only to walk a few paces out of the Cantonment Station yard when one huge expanse of water, as far as the eye can reach, meets your view. The only vestige of once standing and prosperous villages is to be found in mud walls which here and there stand out in relief in the midst of the floods. Thatched roofs float past you with awful rapidity. Men, women and children, cows, buffaloes and pigs are to be found huddled together along portions of the railway line and square inches of dry ground near the level crossings. A passenger who came down from Aligarh way just a few hours before the line was breached mentioned that for forty miles and more the country on both sides of the railway line was one sheet of water, the east expanse being here and there dotted by merely the tops of mango groves which were visible. As I have already informed you there are no less than three breaches between this and the nearest station on the up line. The first breach is about 100 feet in length: the embankment has been completely washed away, leaving the bare rails under which the water runs with great force. The chief railway officials have all come in from Lucknow and are working with might and main to facilitate traffic. Too much credit cannot be given to Mr. Muirhead, Stationmaster, who was one of the first on the scene when the breach was reported, and on his shoulders first fell the arduous task of transshipping the first lot of passengers and goods. In Bareilly city itself hundreds of the inhabitants have been rendered homeless owing to the floods having washed away their houses, goods and chattels. When dry weather (and at present there is not the remotest sign of a break in the clouds) comes once more, and people can look round a bit, I fear the reckoning will be a long and expensive item, necessitating in the first place a large remission by Government of its revenue."

THE high floods on the Ganges completely severed the communication between Cawnpore and Lucknow. Since Tuesday no mails have been received from Cawnpore.

THE Irrawaddy is in high flood and there are fears of inundation at Maadalay.

THE Lieutenant-Governor is timed for Monghyr on the 12th. The Ganges there has not yet reached its average. The register gives 27'2, or one inch below. Preparations are making for his reception. The Maharaja of Giddhore gives a grand dinner. The Ghats will be illuminated. Fireworks and a Ball are on the programme. Invitations are out and subscriptions pouring in rapidly.

THE operations of the Burma and Chittagong Columns of the Chin-Lushai Expeditionary Force, were intended, as explained by the Most Hon'ble the Viceroy and Governor-General of India in Council, "to inflict chastisement on such tribes as had committed depredations on British territory, to extend British influence over these and other tribes, to explore the country between Chittagong and Burma, to complete, if possible, a mule road between Bengal and Burma, and, by the establishment of communications and military posts, to ensure the recognition of the paramount power and the pacification of the country." The Governor-General in Council is satisfied with the Commander-in-Chief that all these objects have been successfully attained, and expresses "his great appreciation of the excellent conduct of the British and Native troops, who so well sustained the reputation of Her Majesty's army under circumstances of difficulty and hardship and, especially on the Burma side, in the face of severe sufferings from sickness." Every person or thing connected with the Expedition comes in for his or its share of praise.

KALKA on the road to Simla has not the distinction of a municipality. It is proposed, however, to raise it to one as it will be the terminus of the railway towards the summer capital. But in the Hill capital itself, they have grown sick of municipal government.

THE London correspondent of the Hindu, talking of the Cashmere debate in Parliament, says :—

"What amazes me is the cowed—I had almost said the cowardly—attitude of the Indian Princes generally in view of the wrong done to the Maharaja of Cashmere in deposing him without inquiry of any kind. Should it suit the views of the Government of India to virtually annex any territory of a feudatory, the said case of the Maharaja may be that of any Prince. The Princes do not seem to have even the instinct of self-preservation."

That very instinct keeps them aloof. They know too well that that fate may overtake them any moment, and all the sooner for any overt demonstration, in word or deed, of sympathy for an oppressed brother. For all that, their prayers are constantly offered for him in secret to Heaven. Alas! that Heaven should so often seem to be on the side of the master of the more efficient battalions and play into the hands of Power, in fact!

THE Petroleum Act, XII of 1886, was passed in March of that year. But it has hitherto been a dead letter, not being in operation. On the 31st July 1890, it was amended by a change in the schedule. It came into force only from the 2nd August 1890. And then there are honest men who argue that the "Exodus" does no harm to the country. It took the Government four years to put the law into operation. To be able to do so, it was necessary to fix the rules for regulation of the importation, storage, possession and transport of the inflammable oil, and to provide the necessary testing apparatus. This became an arduous task. A Government of irresponsible foreigners often on the wing from place to place and having its Head Quarters mostly in High Asia, far far away from ports and commerce, consumed months and years over them. When, everything provided and fixed, the law was ready for enforcement, the Government discovered that the inflammable test required amendment. Common sense suggests that the passing of the law ought to have been delayed till all the preliminaries had been arranged for. Any administration with self respect would avoid the amendment of a law before it has been put in force. But the "Exodus"-wallahs don't care, so long as there is corn in Egypt. Caravans have no shame.

THE Petroleum Act, 1886, or rather its schedule has been amended to facilitate the determination of the legal flashing point of inflammable oils, in the form suggested and approved by Sir F. Abel. The details as explained by the Hon'ble Mover of the Bill Mr. Hutchins, "will only be really intelligible to experts in physical science." "It would require a lecture in chemistry and a series of practical illustrations with a proper apparatus clearly to demonstrate wherein the old schedule is defective and how the defects are to be remedied." Precluded thus from criticism, we can only hope that the present amendment, while protecting the rest of the public, will not unduly affect the trade.

THE Indian Emigration Act, 1883, is being amended

"(1) to save owners of steam-ships the expense and inconvenience of having the hulls and machinery of their vessels surveyed under the Indian Emigration Act, 1883, when valid and proper certificates as to their sufficiency and good condition have already been obtained under other Acts and are still in force, and

(2) to extend, in the first instance, to British North Borneo, which proposes to procure labour from India through the agency of the Government of the Straits Settlements, the same facilities for procuring such labour as have been conceded to the Straits Settlements and to protected States adjoining those Settlements."

The Hon'ble Mr. Hutchins in moving for leave to introduce the Bill, among other things, said :—

"Now in 1883 and for a few years afterwards I do not suppose that many steam-vessels were offered for the Indian emigration service, and no inconvenience was experienced. But of late, I am glad to say, the use of steamers for this purpose has become quite common, very much to the comfort and advantage of natives of India proceeding to our colonies. This Council will certainly be anxious to encourage the best class of steamers to offer themselves for the carriage of emigrants, and therefore to remove any unnecessary restrictions tending to make such service vexatious or unremunerative. I understand that to open up a ship and her machinery for a complete survey involves a loss of at least a week at Calcutta; and at Madras, our other great emigration port, it is reported to be quite impossible fully to carry out the letter of the law. Owing to the want of docking accommodation, a complete survey of the hull of a vessel is impracticable, and even the internal examination cannot be properly conducted, since steamers which now take emigrants from Madras invariably arrive there with cargo on board. In practice, therefore, at Madras the law, as it now stands, does not appear to be fully obeyed, while at Calcutta the requirement of an altogether fresh survey involves a great deal of delay and needless expense, and has deterred, and is likely to deter, the best and largest steamers from tendering for emigration service."

That is the evil of hasty legislation on insufficient information and knowledge. It applies generally to all our Indian Acts. The facility with which an Act can be amended in India affords an incentive to imperfect and ill-digested laws.

THE evil is not confined to the making of laws. It extends to the un-making too. It is bad enough that new measures should be hurried through without due inquiry. Their repeal is not unoften marked by absence of care, labor and foresight. The evidence is furnished by the Indian Salt Act, 1882, amendment Bill. In moving for leave to introduce it, the Hon'ble Sir David Barbour said :—

"In 1882 the great inland customs line of India was abolished and the duties levied on sugar under the Inland Customs Act of 1875 were remitted. The duty on salt ceased to be collected by means of a customs line, and was levied at the places where the salt was produced or manufactured.

"The provisions of the Inland Customs Act of 1875 consequently became to a great extent obsolete, and that Act was repealed, and only so much of it as appeared to be required was re-enacted in the Indian Salt Act of 1882, which consolidated a number of enactments relating to salt.

"Although the inland customs line was abolished and the levy of duty on sugar and salt crossing that line consequently ceased, a preventive line, of minor importance, was still kept up. This was the Indus preventive line, which lies along the upper portion of the river Indus in British territory, and which is intended to prevent the passage of the lightly taxed Kohat salt into the cis-Indus districts.

"It is impossible to say now whether the existence of this preventive line was overlooked in 1882, or whether it was hoped that it would be found possible to abolish it. However this may be, it has not been found possible to abolish the Indus line, and it has continued to exist up to the present time, although certain powers for the regulation of traffic and certain rights of search which are essential for the effective maintenance of the line had been taken away by the repeal of the Inland Customs Act of 1875.

"These powers had been exercised for many years before 1882, and they have been exercised since that year, although the legal basis on which they rested had been withdrawn. So long as these powers were exercised with the consent of the persons affected, or at any rate without any opposition on their part, no practical inconvenience arose. But it has now been brought to light by a decision in a Criminal Court that there is no longer a legal basis for the exercise of the powers in question, and that if the persons affected choose to object to their exercise they can no longer be put in force.

"It is therefore proposed to restore, so far as regards the Indus preventive line, such of the powers formerly given by the Inland Customs Act of 1875 as are necessary for the effective maintenance of the line.

"It has been found possible to make the provisions of the present Bill somewhat less stringent than those of the Act of 1875; and as it is hoped that we may be able to shorten the preventive line, and effect a useful reform, by abandoning the lower portion of the line and substituting a preventive line running westward from the Indus to the frontier, the necessary provision for this purpose has been made in the Bill."

How many such irregularities, not to say illegalities, are perpetrated every day on mere assumption of power, the country, in sheer ignorance, submitting!

THE general progress is being felt among the most backward communities. The very Banias of Gujrat are reforming. The Nisa Nagars in meeting assembled have, so far as lay in them, amended the more objectionable and irksome of their institutions of marriage and mourning. These Gujrati Banias are notorious for their infant marriages. They have now raised the minimum age of betrothal for girls to ten years. At least, the first marital ceremony will not take place until that age. Their deaths are followed by a round of feasting, if not rejoicing, though the enthusiasm for gormandizing looks like it. These parties have been clipped down to one dinner to caste-fellows, and that only on the death of old men. In the pitiable case of the death of the young, noisy parties are to be altogether dispensed with. Widows will still be subjected to the disfiguring humiliation of shaving their heads. Lucky, that even the Bania ladies don't grow hair on the face, any more than the men sport tails behind their backs, or else their fond whiskers, moustaches and beards, would have stood a poor chance of respect at the hands of these awful Vandals. These graceless Gujratis have so far relented that the operation is not to be repeated as now. After the first shave, the growth of the hair is not to be interfered with, the poor widow need not tremble at the sight of a razor and might even look a barber in the face. She will also be free to attend caste dinner parties and take part in the ceremonies of the tribe.

At the same time, they have started a fund for the education of their children. In this the lead has been taken by Sett Narendar Purshotamdas. He had not long ago given Rs. 1,000 towards the instruction of their poor. He has now paid another Rs. 2,000 for scholarships in the High School. Nor are the Nisa Nagar wallahs alone in the field of reform. The Disa Porwads of Ahmedabad too are up and trying earnestly to set their house in order, in accordance with the changed circumstances of the day. If they have not yet attacked their customs touching birth, marriage and death, we expect them to hear them take up these questions every day. Meanwhile, they have taken a very important step. They have broken through their marital exclusiveness. They have decided to form alliances with the other Bania tribes. We hope the others, some at least of them, are prepared to receive their advances.

THE Punjab Government has again recorded its dissatisfaction with Mr. Warburton. All the sympathy of a crowded meeting—even the spectacle of 6,000 Hindus, Mahomedans and Christians beating their breasts and crying for their lost Police officer—have not saved him. Order has been passed for the Police Superintendent of Amritsar's transfer. He probably goes to Sialkot. In British administration in India, that is no ordinary punishment for a White-man. It must be remembered that he is not shelved up, but sent down to a comparatively insignificant place. Now that his Government has done with him, he, it is said, takes three months' leave to be free to pursue, in the law courts, to his heart's content, the Tribune, the cause of all his dishonor. He is already armed with authority from Government to proceed against the offending journal for defamation. It simply gives him permission, but will not pay his expenses, shewing that it has no grievance against the Tribune, but if Mr. Warburton have been personally maligned, it will not stand in the way of his getting justice. A fund is being raised by his sympathisers and friends which has come up to a thousand. We wonder how many made up this sum. It might be useful to know who bled most in sorrow for this over-zealous Police officer. We hope Mr. Warburton will be better advised and not rashly resign himself to the hands of lawyers. The Tribune has enough justification in the two orders of the Punjab Government against Mr. Warburton, and if it is to suffer for the good done, then farewell to the cause of exposure of wrongs and misdeeds in the public interest!

THE inquiry for the mote in others' eye so lustily undertaken and so bravely and briskly pursued, hangs fire. The Syndicate is in a fix—the University under a cloud—of smoke, of its own manufacture. The dons have succeeded in enveloping the subject in the same smoke. There is no knowing anything about it. It is impertinence to ask and high treason to tell. Talk of state secrets! Why, there are no secrets like University—scandals. So far as we have been able to gather, the situation is this. The threatened punishment of the Ripon College has, for the moment, been averted. We shrewdly guess it will never be carried out, or even pronounced. We believe the members of the Syndicate are now half-ashamed of their proceedings. Up to this, there has been no trial—nay, not even a formal impeachment. What, then, shall be said of a Resolution to pronounce the heavy sentence of disfranchisement! If such a Resolution has, as is currently reported and believed; passed, the Syndicate must disresolve and swallow and digest it as best it might, or, if it were obstinate, the Senate must, in the interest of the University, suppress it.

So long ago as the 29th July, the proprietor of the Ripon College, startled by the news of the sentence passed, wrote to the University requesting to be furnished with the complaint, the charges, and the report of the Syndicate sub-committee which inquired into the subject, together with the evidence and exhibits recorded. Up to this afternoon, no notice has been taken of this application!

That shows weakness not only in the men but also in their cause.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 9, 1890.

THE LEPROSY QUESTION.

ITS REDUCTION TO PRACTICE IN CALCUTTA.

THE Indian Daily News is nothing if not practical, and it has tackled the question of Leprosy, which has been in the papers these two years, characteristically. The number of lepers in India has been roundly stated to be a quarter million. That may be an imaginary figure, and we have no means of testing it. Of the Presidency capitals, Madras is said to be the most numerously stricken, with 8,400, Bombay the next worst, with 7,000, and Calcutta the last in the scale of disease, having a leper population of 6,000. The last figure is reduced by a writer in the Statesman to 4,228. Even this is no inconsiderable number, for a single town. Nor must we forget that there are others, many others, besides the Presidential towns. Not only capitals like Allahabad, Lahore, Nagpore, Rangoon, but also great cities of scarcely less importance like Lucknow, Agra, Delhi, Cawnpore, Amritsar, to go no farther than Northern India. In Bengal itself, there are Dacca and Patna. Then there are minor towns, district stations, military cantonments, and municipalities in scores. What must be the aggregate of the lepers of all these various centres! Making all necessary deductions, we may well despair of dealing to any purpose, except under the gravest pressure of circumstances, with so enormous a fraction of the general population. Private charity stands appalled before such numbers. Even a great Government which has so much to do in other respects, must shrink from undertaking the charge of providing for such a vast amount of disease and misery. After all, the scope of such charitable or state interference must be exceedingly limited. It could not eradicate the disease from the country; the utmost that might be hoped for was to check, to some very feeble extent, its spread. The check being so small, the disease must go on spreading, while the provision for it must be continually augmented and fresh accommodation and means of support and treatment must be found for newer inmates of the hospitals and asylums. Leprosy, though most offensive, is probably not necessarily contagious. At least, such is the opinion of a majority of experts and observers. If so, it follows that its rise is due to other causes than contact, the chief being heredity. So far as hereditary taint develops into leprosy, it is not, either in inception or progress, amenable to administration, to say nothing of private interference of associated or individual kindness. But there seem to be other causes more open. At all events, it is of the utmost importance for all mankind to know whether Leprosy, qua disease, is combatable. On this point, it is satisfactory that at least there are those who still regard it an open question. They are a small minority, of course. In general, it must be confessed, the attitude of science is one of despair. It is singularly discreditable to the Faculty, that in these days, at the height of investigation and improvement in all departments, when every week brings forth its new discovery, Medicine alone, the most useful of all the sciences, though quite as active as any other, is steadily recognising fresh impossibilities. Every inquirer adds to the list of incurable maladies. So Leprosy has been voted one. And this with an emphasis forbidding question, and with a learned particularity precluding inquiry. The doctors have almost contrived first to confound a simple matter and then to elevate it to the rank of a mystery, like the doctrine of election or grace in theology. In its source, Leprosy is like original sin, and in its progress like the primeval curse: altogether, it is an inalienable burden. They cannot even determine whether the disease is communicable to the sound by commingling with the diseased, without inoculation into the blood. There never was such a confession of defeat. Medical men are not the most modest of the votaries of Science, but here they are reduced to utter helplessness. They virtually retire from the field, routed. After that, they bring themselves very near to the position of ordinary dabblers. They have voluntarily abandoned their vantage ground of sturdy fighters with Nature, resolved to conquer the ills that flesh is heir to. They are no longer scientific experts not to be questioned by lay commonsense, but amateurs who must calmly submit to be assailed by rival amateurs and made sport of by publicists. Holding their view, they can, with the rest of us all, regard lepers only as objects of charity, like other hopeless miseries, like the cripple, the blind, the deaf and dumb, and so forth. Accordingly, they are for segregation of the sufferers, the more so as, besides the repulsive phenomena of the disease, there is possibly a risk of communication by indiscriminate and negligent commingling of the affected element with the general population. They are for complete separation, by deportation if possible, certainly by removal from towns and busy haunts.

Such an attempt is next to impracticable. The figures are prohibitive. It is impossible to deal with completeness, with any prospect of success, with such a vast leper population. Private effort is a drop in the ocean, and the Government will be slow to undertake such a responsibility unless goaded by a widespread danger or a most influential, not to say imperative, panic. Under the circumstances, the Indian Daily News falls back on the alternative of cure. That is one too often suggested to be too summarily abandoned. We hope it will receive a more steady attention, whatever may be its ultimate fate. Is the problem of therapeutic treatment so desperate? We hope not. We all in this country have heard, from time to time, of occasional cures of bad cases, not by European medicine, nor even by regular Hindu or Mahomedan practice, but by members of the much-abused fraternity of "quacks," or of the much-suspected body of Fakirs and Yogeas. We ourselves remember one instance that happened many years ago, in our own neighbourhood in a suburban town. Two cases have occurred lately in our own ward in town. In fact, they are still under treatment, and may be seen by those who care to inquire. If they have not been thoroughly cured, that is scarcely the fault of the medicine, for the patients are negligent, and there is no control over them, they not being in hospital. They live at home and go about after their bread as usual, eating and doing what they list. One has not the most suitable of occupations, and he cannot afford the best regimen. The treatment, being gratuitous and free in every sense, is not so much respected as it ought to be, and it would have been entirely given up but for the extraordinary results. There is no doubt that the drug has a most decided action, and no unprejudiced observer can resist the conclusion that it is, speaking moderately, a very good medicine for leprosy. There are, we have every reason to believe, other medicines too. Surely, we ought to welcome those who have curative suggestions to offer and to test them thoroughly, without official obstructiveness or medical bias. The doctors unfortunately are the greatest danger in the way. Having failed themselves, they are not likely to look with favour on the prospect of any outsiders being more successful. We wish we could, in this matter, send them all to the right about, but this is impossible. Every precaution, however, should be taken against their undue interference. Mere medical men should not be trusted with the fate of any treatment presented for trial. There should be lawyers and judicial officers and independent men of wellknown general capacity to judge the evidence and protect the experiments. Before the Government is committed to any extensive and expensive projects, or any harsh inquisitorial and vexatious legislation, surely an elaborate investigation ought to take place—a regular department opened. First of all, there ought to be issued a blue-book bringing into focus all the different opinions scattered about, in general and state literature, on the subject of Leprosy, and giving the experiments already made with various specifics, such as Garjan oil—tried many years ago in this Presidency and specially in the Andamans—and the late Dr. Bhau Dajee's drug, tried in Bombay. Notwithstanding the general attitude of the medical Faculty, it is not in human nature to give up the hope of cure. Just now, there are three or four different claims before the Calcutta public. Dr. Chew, late an assistant in the Health department of the Corporation, and Baboo H. C. Dutt, a practical agriculturist who has paid much attention to the botany of the country, each professes to have a cure. Mr. W. H. DeCosta is experimenting with a drug with promising results. Mr. H. R. Cranenburgh has seen wonderful effects of Count Mattei's system. These gentlemen and their respective advocates and critics have, during these months, kept the public mind in some excitement over their writings in the press. The Editor of the Indian Daily News has now taken up the matter in right earnest, with a view to a practical solution. He has discharged quite a catechism at the heads of all and sundry who might in any way whatsoever be concerned. It will bring them to book, either silencing them or making the claimants come forward and substantiate their respective claims, and the others to help in the inquiry. Thus the rambling discussion of claims and counter-claims is brought to a head. He has done more. To prevent all excuse for backing out, he has offered to pay for the trial. In fine,

He has done well and like a gentleman.

If all this does not come to anything, we do not know what to think of. At all events, it will stop the incessant boring with specifics and marvellous cures that has been kept up.

THE FOUCHÉ OF BENGAL.

THE Indian papers have been noticing in a sympathetic spirit Mr. Monro's quarrel as head of the London Police with the Home Secretary. Some of them tell old stories of his characteristics and qualifications. Here is one.

Mr. Monro had a keen nose for sins and could discern a badmash in the air from afar with the unerring instinct with which the cat smells a rat. One native gave him much trouble. After the man's second capture and conviction, Mr. Monro vowed that he should not be worried again on the same account. At the instance of the Inspector-General of the Police, elaborate precautions were taken by the Government of Bengal and other administrations so that, when after his term of imprisonment the man was again wanted, he might be easily got at. In due course he was released from his second confinement. The penal discipline repeatedly undergone by him had had no effect on him. As soon as he breathed the open air without the prison, he was himself again. He might have waited a few days to mature his next plan of operations, but then he was goaded by Mr. Monro himself. He had heard within the jail of the great General Sahib's efforts in his behalf and he must take up the glove thrown. It was a point of honor with him. So the very night of his freedom he committed a daring theft. The Police knew it was he, but they failed to find him. They thought they had got in his track and followed him from place to place, until they found themselves in another Provincial jurisdiction. They now calculated upon an easy capture. According to the directions previously circulated under high authority, there should be no difficulty. But as it usually happens, the precautions had not been thoroughly enforced, and our fugitive was having all the advantage of the lapse. There was no help for it, but Monro would not stop. His agents kept up the pursuit, with such aid as they got from the local executive. They had every hope of success. The scent trail was unbroken. They identified the traces of the man along the whole line, whether he went straight on far and farther or doubled the same path or revolved round a particular district or took a zigzag course, they made sure of his presence in the neighbourhood and, after a temporary puzzling, they invariably hit upon the true line of march. But though they often came near to him, they never came upon him. They were always late by an hour. As he left, they reached. In such cases, they gave hot pursuit if possible. But they were usually too wind broken to attempt a run. Besides, there was risk of losing the track by a wild race, which might give the fugitive an opportunity for a sudden doubling or a quiet deviation. Be that as it may, the man was not caught and there was no catching him, to all appearance. The man's disguises were various, his resources endless. The pursuit was at its wit's end. It had to be given up. Much valuable time and some money too were lost on it to no purpose. The Inspector-General was not sad simply but mad over his discom-figure. He lost his appetite. He would not work—he could not sleep. Day and night he only dreamed—the pursuit of his heart. In fact, he had not given up the inquiry, though the actual pursuit had to be recalled when all clue was lost—the scent interrupted—and the man vanished without leaving a trace. At last, the Fates relented. He had asked his friends in other Provinces to help him in his cause. One of them, more zealous than others, came to his rescue, without suspecting how. He was the head of a District in Upper India. He had taken a particular interest in the inquiry, and had pressed his subordinates into it, with promises in case of success. He had met with one Police officer specially to second his efforts. This officer had entered into the matter with zeal. Although new in the service and the District, he was a smart man and had found some promising clue. He was told to pursue it while the magistrate wrote to Bengal hopefully. Mr. Monro thanked his friend and begged him to encourage his Police officer and report as soon as anything turned up. This hope too was after all blasted. Meanwhile, a light flashed across the Inspector-General's brain. He quietly sent one of his favorite detectives to the Upper Provinces to interview his friend's man. The smart officer who had newly joined the N.-W. P. Police and, though a foreigner in the District, had succeeded in discovering a promising clue which he was leisurely pursuing to the neglect of his ordinary duties, was the thief Mr. Monro so badly wanted. That is worthy of Fouché.

THE TIPPERAH RAJ—(Concluded.)

SIR,—Hari or Haribol is the every third word or phrase in the mouth of the favourites at the court. When they mean a show of seriousness it is even more frequent. The queer fact is not inexplicable. His Highness is becoming more and more Harivakta with his years. In the eagerness of competition, the holy name Hari is disgraced in the mouth of these show-men. If then the Maharaja is possessed by them, it only shows that he is human. Is there a man who under such circumstances would not be favourably disposed to them? But I may here submit before the Maharaja that these favourites, by everything they do to please His Highness, seem to me to reveal their own nature. These astute men with all their profusions of lip-loyalty are, I am afraid, disloyal alike to God, to the Maharaja and to themselves. What they are to the Maharaja subjects and tenantry and his connections in general, I need not determine. But it is sure that the reading of the Bhakti Chaitanya Charitamrita has done them no good—they have never studied the book. I entreat the Maharaja to remember the words of Lord Lansdowne to the Maharaja of Cashmere, as well as the fate of the said Maharaja and others unfortunate like him, "Notwithstanding the ample resources of your state, your treasury was empty; corruption and disorder prevail in every department and every office; Your Highness was surrounded by low and unworthy favourites; and the continued misgovernment of your state was becoming every day a more serious source of anxiety." The memory of the resignation obtained from the Maharaja by Mr. Grear is yet green. Your readers will be probably tickled with the news that the favourites at the court of the Maharaja are, by their own account, the greatest men in Bengal, either among the Europeans or among the children of the soil. They say "After the Maharaja resigned all Bengal was found unequal to the exigency; we consulted all the great men including so and so.....reserving to ourselves our own solution. One and all exclaimed, Impossible! impossible! At last it was our diplomacy that restored the state to the Maharaja. We don't intend to give out the secret of it, and don't mind praising ourselves. After the territory was restored we were asked by many great men what reward we got. We replied, 'Why reward? we did our simple duty.'" Hurrah! Bengalees, raise your caps in their honor. But Bengalees are bare-headed. Ay, there's the rub! Never mind, if one day you are not hallooed out of the principality, the other world is still yours.

The Rai Bahadoor after dismissing the favourites may flatter himself with the expectation of a clear sky. But no. He will find himself outdone if the old method of providing them from the Maharaja's Nij Tababil is still allowed and they are kept near His Highness. Then their evil counsel will prevail.

Rent is the only source of revenue. So when he comes to the Chakla cutchery, I hope he will closely examine how far the difficult work of settlement has progressed. The two Dewans are in no friendly terms with one another. This will require able but quick solution. I also hope the document, prepared by Mr. Sandys, while he was in office, covering a space of twelve years, as to how much was owing to and from the state—assets and liabilities—will catch the eye of the minister.

I am sorry to hear that the minister for the sake of bettering the finances by a paltry sum, is trying to curtail the expenses of the princes and the noblemen at the court. This is unwise to be sure. The past history of the identical efforts of some of his predecessors ought to have guided his policy. It is well to be wise by the misfortune of others.

It is to be hoped he will be no party to the practice in native States of the officials ignoring the claims of those that have left against whom they may have a grudge, specially if they have lost favour and are not permitted or are afraid for fear of insult to approach the capital. I know several who are long waiting for a good and stable administration and some sort of management of finances, while others by threat or complaint to British Agency (Baboo Umakant himself) have got their ducs. It would be a shame if loyal waiters are punished.

This time I have, for obvious reasons, refrained from details. But should it seem necessary, I shall revert to the subject armed with details. I beg to conclude the subject with the hope that I shall be taken in the spirit of candour and good will in which I have written these three letters.

SECRET.

Tipperah, August 4, 1890.

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS IN BENGAL.

Nos. Mis. 1-H-1 18-22, dated Calcutta, the 19th January 1890.
From—H. J. S. Cotton, Esq., Officiating Secretary to the Govt. of Bengal, Financial Department.

To—The Secretary to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce; Secretary to the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce; Secretary to the Calcutta Trades' Association; Secretary to the British Indian Association; and Secretary to the Indian Association.

I am directed to inform you that the Lieutenant-Governor has again had his attention drawn to the question of the number of public holidays in the Bengal Province, and to communicate to you the following observations on the subject, with a request that they may be laid before the Bengal Chamber of Commerce or your Association or the Bengal National Chamber of Commerce, and that you will be so good as to furnish the Lieutenant-Governor with the opinion of the Chamber or the Association on the suggestions made, as well as with any further remarks on the subject which the Chamber or the Association may wish to offer.

2. It appears to the Lieutenant-Governor to be unnecessary to discuss the early history of the question, but in recent times it is material to note the following points:—

3. In 1860 the Bengal Chamber of Commerce suggested that holidays should be reduced to the days actually required for the ceremonial observances of the Hindu religion. A Committee, consisting of Messrs. J. J. Harvey, W. S. Fitz William, and Baboo Prosonno Kumar Tagore was appointed, and recommended, among other things, that the Doorga Poojah holidays should be 14 days for Hindus and 10 days for all other Government servants. These proposals were accepted by the Local Government, but on the 15th April 1862 they were set aside by the Government of India, and 27 days (including 12 days for the Doorga and Lakhi Poojahs) were declared public holidays. The number of days was raised to 30 by the order of the Government of India dated 29th October 1867, and the general holidays then sanctioned have remained unchanged up to the present time.

4. In 1874 the Chamber of Commerce recommended that the Doorga Poojah holidays should be reduced from 12 days to one week, and this proposal was supported by Sir George Campbell. Much opposition was, however, raised, and the proposal was rejected by the Government of India. Arrangements were, however, made for facilitating business in the Custom House, which it was ordered should remain closed for one week only.

5. In 1875 the Calcutta Trades' Association urged that the Doorga Poojah holidays should be reduced to the days of actual religious observance, and it was then directed that the Custom House should remain closed for five days only. The proposal that the Bank of Bengal should be closed for five days only was then rejected by the Government of India.

6. In 1878 the Chamber of Commerce again addressed Government, requesting "that the Doorga Poojah holidays be reduced and restricted to the four days which they understand are absolutely necessary for the observance of that annual festival, with the proviso that, should the festival terminate on a Friday, the holidays be extended so as to admit of business being resumed on the following Monday."

7. A representative Committee was appointed to consider and report on the question. The majority [Messrs. G. Yule, C. J. Brookes, S. Cochrane and J. D. Maclean,] reported as follows:—

"That only the four days required for strictly religious purposes be close holidays;

"That if the fourth religious day fall on Friday, the offices shall not re-open till the following Monday;

"That the Public Debt Office, the Treasury, the Currency Office, the Money-order Office, the Stamp Office, and all Pay offices be closed on these four days only, but that in other Government offices the Heads of Departments shall have discretion to give leave to their subordinates for the whole or any part of the twelve days, provided the current work of their office is carried on."

8. The two Hindu Members (Baboos Kristo Das Pal and Durga Churn Law) of the Committee recorded a dissent which concluded as follows :--

"Considering that the arrangements made by Government in 1874, by which the Custom House is kept open during the Doorga Poojah vacation, except for five days, and the jetties work without intermission, the inconvenience to the trade of the city is not serious; that number of holidays in Bengal is less than that in the other provinces; that a general vacation of seven or eight days during Christmas does not in any way affect or inconvenience commerce in Madras and the North-Western Provinces; that the present Doorga Poojah vacation is necessary for the observance of the religious and social ceremonies of the Hindus; that it is a general holiday for all classes of public servants for rest, recreation and travelling; that it affords almost the only opportunity to the lower grades of officers to visit their mofussil homes once a year; that in a sanitary point of view a prolonged rest of 12 to 15 days in a year is of great importance, as it enables the officers of Government to discharge their duties much more satisfactorily than what they could do if no periodical rest was allowed; and that its curtailment would give rise to much hardship and dissatisfaction among the Hindu as well as other servants of Government, and also among the general public whose business engagements are regulated by the practice in the public offices, we are of opinion that no change in the present Doorga Poojah holidays is called for."

9. Mr. Dampier, the President of this Committee, recorded a separate memorandum, in which he stated that the recommendation of the majority of the Committee "amounted to a proposal that all public offices shall be kept open, and that all persons who are engaged in business must attend to business on all but the four close days." But he considered that the mercantile community had made out a case for some reduction in the length of the holidays and suggested that the number of days should be summarily curtailed from 12 to 9 or 8.

10. The papers of the case were transmitted to the Government of India with a letter from this Government, No. 3809, dated 12th September 1879. In that letter the Lieutenant-Governor observed :--

"It may be conceded that the curtailment of the holidays proposed by the majority of the Committee will not interfere with any bona fide religious prejudices of the Hindu community. Any shortening of the vacation may prevent social ceremonies, visits home, and the enjoyment of the rest and recreation of a holiday; but when the question of opening the Custom House was discussed in 1874 to 1876, it was clearly decided that five days are all that are necessary for the purely religious observances of Hindus during the Doorga and Lakhi Poojahs, and this decision must be considered applicable to the Hindu clerks in all other offices. It must be accepted also as regards Bengal that on days when Hindu employes are authorised to be absent, offices cannot remain open, and that, whatever rule is laid down for the Bank of Bengal, the Currency and Pay offices at the Presidency must of necessity govern the holidays of all or almost all the other offices in Bengal. The partial opening of offices during the latter portion of the vacation, as suggested in the third proposal of the majority of the Committee, is not really practicable, and their recommendation amounts to this, that all public offices shall be kept open on all but the four days of religious observance."

11. The question as a balance of convenience was then discussed by the Bengal Government, and it was recommended that there should be no alteration in the present holidays.

12. This recommendation was not accepted by the Government of India, and in orders dated 4th October 1879 it was directed that effect should be given to the proposals of the majority of the Committee.

13. On the return of the Government of India to Calcutta, the orders of the 4th October were cancelled. In a letter dated 28th January 1880 it is written :--

"Since his return to the Presidency, His Excellency the Governor-General in Council has found reason to doubt whether the Government of India allowed sufficient weight to the inconvenience which will be entailed by the enforcement of this decision upon the Hindu community of Calcutta and some other parts of Bengal, and to the strength of the popular attachment to these annual holidays.

"On the other hand, His Excellency is disposed to think that he may have underrated the extent to which the complaints of the mercantile community may be obviated, or at least mitigated, by careful arrangements in the several public offices to meet their requirements."

14. It is then ordered that "the observance of the Doorga Poojah holidays in the public offices in Calcutta shall continue as heretofore," and the Bengal Government are enjoined to take measures to meet, as far as possible, the convenience of the mercantile community.

15. In 1882 the Chamber of Commerce again urged that the Doorga Poojah holidays should be restricted to the four close days which are alone observed as religious holidays. But both the Government of Bengal and the Government of India refused to re-open the question.

16. During 1886 and 1887 the Chamber of Commerce made several representations on the subject of Custom House holidays and the general routine of Custom House business. Special objection was taken to the continuous closing of the Custom House for periods varying from two to seven days. In 1888 a Committee (Messrs. C. L. P. Macaulay, R. Steel, E. D. Wylie and J. Scobell Armstrong), was appointed to enquire into the whole question, and submitted the following recommendation :--

"It has hitherto been the usage that the Custom House should not be opened on any gazetted holiday for any purpose free of charge, except on certain days in the long holidays of the Doorga Poojahs. This practice appears to us not to be suited to the requirements of the trade of Calcutta. We recommend that for the Custom House, as distinguished from the Preventive Department, Sundays, New Year's Day, Good Friday, the Queen's Birthday and Christmas Day should in future be held to be absolutely close holidays, but that on the week days for which the office is closed in the Doorga Poojahs, and on all ordinary gazetted holidays other than the days mentioned above, the Custom House should be opened free of charge for one hour, viz., from 11 A. M. to 12 noon, all work applied for up to 12 o'clock being carried through, provided that notice is given to the Assistant Collector before closing hours of the day previous, or if this be a holiday, 24 hours in advance, that it is required to have the office so opened. On such opening, vessels would be allowed to enter and clear on the import and export sides, and provisional bill-of-entry for free goods as well as shipping bills for free goods issued, but the treasury would, as in Bombay, remain closed. It is understood that arrangements can be made to carry out this in the Doorga Poojah holidays without obliging Hindu clerks to attend. The above change will further not affect the opening of the Custom House as heretofore on such advertised days as may be fixed on in the Doorga Poojah holidays for the receipt of duty and complete transaction of Custom House business."

17. These proposals were sanctioned by the Local Government.

18. In 1888 and in 1889 the Chamber of Commerce have made further representations to Government, urging that "only those days should be declared public holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act which are actually required to be devoted to necessary religious ceremonies." To these letters the Government has replied at length reciting the arguments which were accepted by the Government of India in 1880 and 1882. It has been pointed out "that the inconvenience and loss which the mercantile community suffer from the existing state of things, great and serious as they are, cannot be remedied without inflicting a still more serious hardship on a far more numerous, though less influential, portion of the community." The Government was unable to comply with the wishes of the Chamber, and on the 11th December 1889 a notification was published in the Gazette, under which the holidays declared under section 25 of the Negotiable Instruments Act will remain the same in 1890 as they have been in previous years.

19. In consequence of the publication of this notification, a deputation from the Chamber, consisting of Sir A. Wilson, Mr. Wylie, Mr. McCaw and Mr. Stuart, waited on the Lieutenant-Governor at Belvedere on the 19th December 1889, and strongly pressed upon His Honour the necessity of reducing the number of holidays under the Act. They laid stress on the alteration which the passing of the Negotiable Instruments Act has introduced into the conditions of the problem since the decision of Government was arrived at in 1879, and they indicated that it might be possible to find a solution of it by restricting the number of holidays gazetted under the Act, but retaining by executive authority the existing number of holidays for all public offices, save the few in Calcutta which are indispensable to the foreign commerce of the port. The question as thus stated deserves very careful consideration.

Law.

JURISDICTION OVER FOREIGNERS.

On the 25th July at the Bombay High Court, the Full Bench of Judges, composed of the Chief Justice, Sir Charles Sargent, the Hon. Mr. Justice Bayley, the Hon. Mr. Justice Telang and the Hon. Mr. Justice Farran, reassembled at the High Court to deliver their decision upon the plea of jurisdiction raised by the counsel for the defence on behalf of the Italian Donat Angelo Constantino, who had been tried at the last Criminal Sessions on a charge of murder by causing the death of one Maldotti Angelo on board the s. s. Bisagno, on the 8th instant, by stabbing him with a knife.

The Chief Justice, in delivering the decision of the Court, said :

This is a reference made under section 434 of the Code of Criminal Procedure by the Judge presiding at the recent Criminal Sessions, at which the accused, Donat Angelo Constantino, was indicted on a charge of murder, by having caused the death of another Italian named Maldotti Angelo, on board the s.s. Bisagno, an Italian steamer of the Rubattino line when lying in the Victoria Docks, on the 8th instant. He was found guilty by the jury of culpable homicide not amounting to murder, and the Judge who presided reserved the question of whether the Court had jurisdiction to try and sentence a foreigner. As this offence was committed in the Victoria Dock, it is plain that, whether the dock be considered as a part of the main land, which is covered with water, or as a continuation of the port, it was committed within "the island of Bombay, or the limits thereof," over which the ordinary original jurisdiction of the High Court extends. [The Queen vs. Essub, Perry "Oriental Cases," 577.] Two objections have, however, been taken to the jurisdiction (1) that the offence was committed upon an Italian ship—(2) That the offence was committed by one of the crew against another, who was not a British subject. The immunity of a foreign merchant vessel from the local jurisdiction came under the consideration of the Judges, necessarily, in the case of the Franconia, reported in two Exchequer Division, and a perusal of the judgment delivered shows that, whatever differences of opinion there were, they have been on the question then before the Court, viz., as to the nature of the jurisdiction which a State possesses over what is called the territorial sea extending to the distance of three miles along its coast; there was none whatever as to the jurisdiction which a State possesses over foreign merchant vessels when lying in its ports. I will refer to two or three of those judgments in particular. Sir Robert Phillimore, at page 82 of Law Reports, Exchequer Division, in the case of Queen vs. Keyn, says: "A foreign merchant vessel going into the port of a foreign state subjects itself to the ordinary law of the place during the period of her comorancy there; she is as much a subditus temporaneus as the individual who visits the interior of the country for the purpose of pleasure or business." Mr. Justice Lindley, at page 93, says: "It is admitted that a foreign merchant ship which enters the ports, harbours, or rivers of England, becomes subject to English law, her so-called territoriality does not in that case exclude the operation of English law." Lord Justice Cockburn, at page 161, says: "On board a foreign ship, on the high seas, the foreigner is liable to the law of the foreign ship only. It is only when a foreign ship comes into the ports or waters of another State that the ship and those on board become subject to the local law. These are the established rules of the law of nations. They have been adopted into our own municipal law, and must be taken to form a part of it." These views I may also mention, which are mainly based on the writings of the most eminent of the earlier authors on international law, from the time of Vattel, are regarded as well established, and placed beyond all doubt by more modern writers on the subject, such as Wheaton, Forsyth and Hall. The case of Cunningham (in Bell's "Criminal Cases," page 72), where a murder was committed on board an American ship when in the Severn, is sufficient to illustrate the statement of Lord Justice Cockburn, that the rule as above enumerated had been adopted in our own municipal laws. The case of Queen vs. Anderson, 1 Crown cases and Regina vs. Allen, 1, Moody Cr. Cases 194, referred to by the counsel for the accused, have no application to the present question. They relate to the question how far the "high seas" extend, on which it is not disputed a foreign ship retains its nationality, and all persons on board are considered as within the jurisdiction of that nation whose flag is flying on the ship. It was said however that it was not the practice of France and other States to exercise their jurisdiction—see Hall on "International Law," page 199—where the acts relate solely to the internal discipline of the vessel, or even crimes and lesser offences committed by one of the crew against another, when the peace of the port is not affected, distinguished from crimes and offences committed upon or by persons not belonging to the crew or even by members of it upon each other, provided, in the latter case, that the peace of the port is compromised; and this Court was asked to act upon that distinction. This distinction, I may observe, is also referred to by Sir Robert Phillimore in his judgment in the following terms:—"It may be that the foreign State, influenced by considerations of public policy or by treaty of obligations, chooses to forego the exercise of her law over the foreign vessel and crew, or exercises it only when they disturb the peace and good order of the port." In other words, the State consideration distinguishes between the two classes of cases and declines to exercise the jurisdiction, which of right belonged to it in one of those classes. Mr. Forsyth, in his work alluding to this distinction, says it has never been adopted by the English Courts. It was also contended that there is no actual case to be found which is in accordance with such a limitation of the jurisdiction. It was pointed out that in the Cunningham case it is affirmatively stated that the murdered man Riley was an American. This is true, although being one of the crew of an American ship, it is probable that Riley was regarded as an American, and that the case was dealt with on that assumption. But assuming that the question is clear of direct authority, and that there may even be good reason for such distinction, this Court cannot in the absence of any Legislative Enactment or Consular Convention, between England and Italy, limiting the exercise of the jurisdiction as contended for, take upon itself to qualify a jurisdiction which, by the very principle on which it rests, is exclusive and absolute. We must, therefore, answer the question referred to us in the affirmative.

Mr. Justice Bayley said: I entirely am of the same opinion and agree with all that has been said by his Lordship the Chief Justice.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.
We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE LONELY HOME.

THERE'S none to say "good night" to me—
No friend my little fire to share ;
The old hoarse clock ticks drearily,
And makes the silence worse to bear.
Gone ! all are gone ! the fondest, best,
And loveliest that I call my own ;
After brief suffering they're at rest ;
They—they lived not to wail alone !

Alone, alone—morn, noon, and eve,
I see the old chairs keep their place ;
I watch the dirty spider weave
Where once there shone a household grace.
The brightness of my home is dull—
The busy faces all are gone ;
I gaze—and oh ! my heart is full—
My aching heart that breaks alone.

I ope the Bible, gray with age—
The same my hapless grandsire read,
But tears stain fast and deep that page
Which keep their names—my loved—my dead
The wandering stranger by my door—
The passing tread—the distant tone—
All human sounds but deepen more
The feeling I am lone—alone !

My cot with mantling ivy green,
Its pleasant porch, its sanded floor—
Ah ! time's dread touch hath changed the scene,
What was, alas ! is now no more !
The key hath rusted in the lock,
So long since I the threshold crossed :
Why should I see the sun but mock
The blessed light, my home hath lost ?

Oh ! would my last, low bed were made ;
But death forsakes the lone and old !
Seeks the blythe cheek of youth to fade,
To crush the gay, the strong, the bold ;
Yet sometimes through the long dull night,
When hours find supernatural tone,
I hear a promise of delight,
Thou God ! Thou leavest me not alone.

The wintry rain fell fast and deep,
As slow a coffin passed the road,
No mourner there was seen to weep—
No follower to that last abode !
Yet there a broken heart found peace—
The peace that but in death it knew ;
Alas ! that human loves increase
Our human woes and miseries too !

THE GREEK SLAVE.

SUGGESTED BY POWER'S STATUE.

THOU art no slave, albeit thy hands are bound.
I would we were, even as thou art, freed !
The insolent comment of the gazers round
Thy heart is poised too far away to heed.
The shade of sadness, o'er thy patience cast,
Neither accuses Heaven nor chides at man.
Thou waitest till this lot be over-past,
As only those whose hearts are holden, can.
Thy woman's beauty, robbed of sheltering vest,
Makes solitude in the rude market place,
As if a spirit stood there, manifest,
Vouchsafing to our eyes a perfect grace.
Thy head is bowed, but not with shame or fear.
The present lays no iron hand on thee ;
The Past, the Eternal Future, stand too near.
Motionless, fettered, naked, thou art free,
Clothed on with chastity ; and waiting there,
The thing that God appointeth thou wilt bear,
Holy and lovely, as a lily stands
Bearing fresh dew from His baptizing hands.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

IT is reported from Bahraich on the 9th instant that

"The river Gogra is in high flood. Its waters have extended to about seven miles from the main current. Many human corpses and hundreds of cattle were seen going down the current. The 'oldest inhabitant' (he is aged 80 years) says that he has never seen the river in such a state of flood."

THE Celestial Emperor has approved of the Sikkim treaty signed at Calcutta by the Viceroy and the Amban Sheng Tai. The ratification is on its way to England. Mr. Acheson, of H. I. M. Customs, takes the document to Shanghai and Mr. A. H. Harris to England.

HERE is indeed a very quiet statement of a highly stirring incident :—

"Japanese Parliament.—The first general election for the new Parliament in Japan has taken place, and passed off quietly with one exception, in the Kagawa prefecture, where Mr. Ito Ichiro, the successful candidate for the Fifth District, was assassinated."

That is the progress of parliamentary government with a vengeance, literally.

THE "Phenomenal Female" of Paris is dead. She bore the name of Victoria Tautin and was 19 years of age. She was not a giantess in height but her girth was enormous. It took eight strong men to lift her out of her chair. She was for a time on exhibition. But it did not pay, the cost of her transit mostly eating up the realizations. She therefore gave up public life and retired to obscurity with her parents. Lately, she had an attack of erysipelas and died. She was carried to her grave on the shoulders of ten most robust undertakers.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

THE European and Anglo-Indian Defence Association is widening the scope of its activity. It has memorialised the Viceroy in a long document for the abolition of the Income Tax as "not only causing serious injustice and great irritation while securing an altogether incommensurate return, but also undermining the popularity of the Government."

THE Viceregal party, consisting of His Excellency, Lord Kerry, Captain Herboard and Dr. Fenn, left Simla on the 8th and by rapid march and ride reached Narkanda in about six hours. The latest news is that they have arrived safely at Saharan.

THE Maharaja of Cooch Behar has been to Darjeeling, is now at Calcutta and goes to Simla.

NEW Regulations for the open competition for the Indian Civil Service have been published differing in important respects from those hitherto in force :—

"The examination will commence on August 1, 1892, instead of the beginning of June. The candidates must be over twenty-one and under twenty-three years of age on April 1, 1892. The old limits were seventeen and nineteen on the previous January 1. An order for admission to the examination will be sent to each candidate on July 18, two months later than hitherto. It is evidently intended to make the examination far stiffer than before. The subjects are more numerous, and the maximum marks obtainable are 12,700 in place of 7,100. Candidates will no longer be at liberty to select a particular period in English History in which to be examined, and the following notes in the old prospectus are not in the new. A considerable portion of the marks for English History and Literature will be allotted to the work selected by the candidate. In awarding marks for this, regard will be had partly to the extent and importance of the period or books selected, but chiefly to the thoroughness with which they have been studied. The examination in mathematics will range from arithmetic, algebra, and elementary geometry, up to the elements of the differential and integral calculus, including the lower portions of applied mathematics. The standard of marking in Sanskrit and Arabic will be determined with reference to a high degree of proficiency, such as may be expected to be reached by a native of good education. Instead of two years' probation in England, and periodical examinations, the new prospectus reads thus :—Selected candidates before proceeding to India will be on probation for one year, at the end of which time they will be examined, with a view of testing their progress. The marks in the final examination will be subject to deductions as in the open competition. Persons desirous to be admitted as candidates must apply on forms which may be obtained from 'The Secretary, Civil Service Commission, London, S. W.,' at any time after December 1, 1891. The forms must be returned so as to be received at the office of the Civil Service Commissioners on or before May 31, 1892. Evidence of health and character must bear date not earlier than May 1, 1892. Seniority in the Service will be determined by the candidate's position in the list resulting from the combined marks of the Open and Final examinations. Hitherto the Final Examination alone has fixed the seniority. An allowance of £100 (instead of £300) will be given to all candidates who pass their probation at one of the universities or colleges approved by the Secretary of State. Candidates selected under these regulations in 1892 will, in view of the alteration in the limits of age, have seniority over the candidates selected under the previous regulations in 1891."

ON the second reading of the Census Bills for England, Scotland, and Ireland in the House of Commons on July 21, Mr. Goschen said that the Government were disposed to look upon a quinquennial census with favour. The England and Wales Bill passed through Committee, an amendment by Baron Dimsdale to include religion in the returns being lost by 288 against 69. The census day is fixed for Sunday, April 5, 1891.

IN answer to Mr. Birrell, Sir J. Grost told the House of Commons on July 18 :—

"The duties of the Political A.-D.-C. to the Secretary of State are—to attend on Native Princes visiting this country; to represent the Secretary of State when Natives are presented at Court; to exercise a general supervision over the welfare of Natives, students and others, sent to this country by the Government of India, or recommended to the good offices of the Secretary of State; to make recommendations to the Secretary of State as to the disposal of the cases of destitute Natives who apply for relief to the India Office. His salary is £500, with £300 for contingencies, and is paid from the revenue of India. The Secretary of State does not contemplate the abolition of the office. The Political A.-D.-C. is, like other members of the establishment of the India Office, under the control of the Secretary of State."

In fact, the post of Political A.-D.-C. is a politic and pretty sinecure, all the better for being charged on the Indian taxpayer.

J. E. BUDD, late District Registrar of Fyzabad, has been committed to the N.-W. P. High Court, for accepting illegal gratifications. He is out on bail of Rs. 6,000.

MR. RICE, the Deputy Commissioner of Minbu, is under arrest. The charge against him is, as put by the Statesman, that "a considerable sum of money which was realized as fine by a Burman deputy magistrate from some dacoit-harboursing villages, was not to be found entered in the books of the district treasury." The friends of the unfortunate gentleman had better come to his help at once. In the first place, it is the fate of Rice and Curry to run the race of life enormously handicapped, they having, besides carrying the burden of their own laches, to undertake those of others'. This is, of course, peculiarly the case with Rice and Curry served on the floor on plantain leaf or in pewter or brass or cheap earthen ware. But Table Rice and Curry on table can not altogether escape the curse of race. Be that as it may, there has been so much looting in Burma, ever since the fall of Mandalay by Gramfed mutton and Fat turkey, that, now that a fuss has been raised over a petty defalcation or suspicion of it, poor Rice and Curry may well be seized as handy victims upon whom to vindicate the character of administration and give stern warning to—minor depredators and uninfluential misdoers.

IN future, the 4th Regiment of Bengal Infantry will be designated "the 4th (Prince Albert Victor's) Regiment of Bengal Infantry." Could not the two names be amalgamated under a shorter title?

THE Receipts and Expenditure on account of the Burma Coast lights during the financial year ending 31st March 1890, were respectively Rs. 2,14,154-6-6 and Rs. 1,89,096-0-0. Under the twelve items published, the expenditure is always in rupees without any fractions thereof in anna and pie.

SURGEON-Major A. Crombie, having obtained two months and eighteen days' leave from the 30th July, Surgeon-Major J. F. P. McConnell acts as Surgeon Superintendent, Presidency General Hospitals, Calcutta, Surgeon-Major A. Tomes, from Midnapore, doing the duties of Civil Surgeon, 24-Pergunnahs. Deputy Surgeon-General A. H. Hilson, too, goes on six weeks' leave from the 10th August, and Brigade-Surgeon R. C. Chandra, Professor, Medical College, Calcutta, officiates as Inspector-General of Civil Hospitals, Bengal, in addition to his own duties. Last time, when Dr. Hilson was away from his post, Dr. Coates did his duties in addition to his own as Principal of the Medical College. But this time the Principal is kept out and the Professor elected, by way of some reparation, we believe, for loss of the Principalship to which Dr. Chandra believed himself entitled on account of his present senior position in the service.

THE Postmaster General of the Punjab, Mr. J. Dillon, going on leave for two months and twenty-three days from the 19th August, the Presidency Postmaster of Calcutta, Mr. E. Hutton, goes to the Punjab, his Deputy Mr. G. E. Walker acting as full Presidency Postmaster.

THE Archaeological Surveyor, Punjab Circle, Mr. Chas. J. Rodgers, is now engaged on a catalogue of the coins in the Lahore Museum. After completion of that work, he comes down to Calcutta to report on those in the Indian Museum. His engagement with the Punjab Government ceases on the 30th September, the post having been abolished.

THE Dowager Maharanee of Bettiah, aunt of the present Maharaja of Benares, died on the 12th inst. at that sacred city.

THE Governor-General in Council has extended the rules dated the 24th June 1887 under Act IV of 1884 to the whole of British India, but those relating to the transport of explosives shall not apply to any port as defined in the Indian Ports Act, X of 1889, for which special rules made by the Local Government are for the time being in force, in so far as they are expressly superseded by, or are inconsistent with, such special rules.

AT Madras, on Tuesday, a young married man of 25, George Edward Watson, Chief Reporter of the Madras Mail, and formerly Reporter of the Bombay Gazette, shot himself to death with a revolver, in a fit of temporary insanity, according to the conventional finding of the Coroner's jury.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Czar of all the Russias is not dead to the modern sentiment against wholesale extermination of races. The eyes of the civilized world were directed to the threatened Ukase against the Jews. His Imperial Majesty thought better of it and the mandate has not been promulgated. The Lord Mayor of London who had notified a meeting to protest against the measure has consequently issued a fresh notice deferring its consideration.

A SAD accident has occurred in the Russian Navy. Reuter telegraphs that during the trial of the new line of battle ship Sinope at Odessa on the Black Sea, a boiler exploded on board, killing Prince Chilkoff and twelve sailors.

THE Czarewitch will see the world—Eastern. He sets out in September; visits Constantinople and Palestine, takes in Egypt, turns Eothen, sailing over to India, and then strays farther East unto the farthest, to China and Japan, returning in spring through Siberia from Vladivostock.

TELEGRAPHIC news has reached Madrid of the massacre of 128 Spanish soldiers by natives in the Caroline Islands.

DURING the week, the Irish Irreconcilables contributed a "scene" and a "sensatiou" to Parliamentary proceedings. It was all the more a surprise in that it was not on an Irish night—on which people might be prepared for Patrickian if not patrician exhibitions or ebullitions—nor, apparently, on any distinctly Irish matter. The hero was the redoubtable Dr. Tanner. On Tuesday evening the House of Commons was sitting in Committee of the whole House on the Estimates. In the course of the discussion, the Doctor burst forth against Her Majesty's Secretary for Home Affairs, proclaiming Mr. Matthews the meanest and basest skunk who had ever held office. That is not simply unparliamentary invective but also language calculated to create a breach of the peace. It was doubtless followed by great uproar in old St. Stephen's chapel. The Chairman rose to order, and called on the fiery orator to retract. Thereupon, Dr. Tanner withdrew the unfortunate expression, and apologised. And then the matter, indeed, the uproar subsided, and the representatives of the free and independent citizens of the United Kingdom resumed the even tenour of their way and proceeded on their congenial inquiry into the ways and means of the state. Dr. Tanner was not fined for calling Her Majesty's Principal Minister for Home "the meanest and basest skunk who had ever held office."

THE House of Commons having at last, after much debating and protracted sittings, voted the Supply, and the Indian Budget being presented, Parliament will be prorogued next Monday. As explained by Sir John Gorst, the finances of India are in a flourishing condition, due to the rise in silver, the increase of revenue and reduction in expenditure. The surplus for 1889-90, was £2,677,000; that for the current year is given at £1,870,000. But for the rise in exchange, this latter increase would have been half a million below the estimate. £1,500,000 of the Salt duty have been diverted to the Famine Fund, whatever that may mean. No reduction in the Salt duty must, in any case, be expected, for the further surplus might just as well be devoted to the same Sinking Fund—or its ghost, for the Fund has long since vanished under the manipulation of the financial wizards of Government.

SIR EDWARD BRADFORD's inauguration as head of the London Police has been marked by a sad accident. While riding in the Park, on the morning of the 13th, his horse shied and he fell clean off the animal.

He was picked up senseless. He has since recovered consciousness but is still suffering from the shock of the fall.

What a pity that the Empire City of the Old World cannot get the benefit of a whole man for the head of its Police! We trust it is no sign of degeneracy that London must repeatedly put up with infirmity, in some particular or another.

If the Metropolitan Constabulary is sorely discontented and not satisfactorily commanded or governed, the National Army is not a whit more to be envied. The spirit of defiance and mischief is in the air.

THE mutiny of the Grenadiers has been followed by that of the Army Service Corps at Chatham. There was complaint of extra Sunday work. On the 8th, the men refused to attend parade, and barricaded themselves in their quarters. They, however, ultimately submitted. Twenty of them have been sentenced to a month's imprisonment. Two non-commissioned officers have been discharged and another arrested, and the men are now confined to the barracks. There have been many desertions.

These are all circumstances most painful to all loyal citizens of the British Empire. To us whose chance of political education depends on the prosperity of Britain, they are profoundly depressing. What a spectacle is this for dear England to present. Her whole available army was never more numerous than a Continental Corps d'arme. But then it was composed of picked men. That tradition has received a death-blow, and with it will pass away all the prestige of it.

THE British who in the East are wont to rail at the ceremoniousness of Orientals, are not a little wedded to ceremony themselves. They could not leave a speck of rock in the so-called German Ocean—German Oceans are diminutive like German principalities—without the customary demonstrations. In the present case, they were of the most miserable—in every respect, and we think we notice some disappointment in consequence. Reuter reports that on the 9th Governor Barkly delivered over Heligoland to the German representative, who bears a truly Gothic name, which we will not try to write down for the torture of compositors and "readers" and readers in general. Both British and German flags were hoisted together for the nonce, preparatory to the former being taken down "for good." Both the British and German war vessels present saluted the twain. We imagine the Union Jack could scarcely conquer its self-consciousness and probably refused to be unfurled for the worse than ephemeral—mere momentary—lamasha. How could the proud rag confront its Continental brother—how look in the face the assembled spectators of both nations! It certainly could not float with dignity or air in comfort its different hues, after having received its conge. Soon it was bundled up and bundled out of town and harbour. With it went the members of the British Government and all the insignia and traces of British sovereignty, almost thankful for the cloud of smoke in which they were permitted to retire from their watch tower in the North Sea.

Again! again! again!
And the firing then went slack,
Till a feeble British cheer
To their cheering sent we back;—
Our guns along the deep slowly boom:—
Then ceas'd—and all is gloom,
As of sorrow and the tomb.

Such is the sad story of the final retirement.

There was no sound of revelry by night or day. "Not a drum was heard." Even that sine qua non of British dealings—the dinner, seems to have been dispensed with. The British party in their melancholy mission had lost all appetite, we fear. The Goths had not the grace to dismiss them with a feed. Sic transit mundi—from Heligoland.

THE sorrow of one nation is the joy of another. After the Germans dismissed the former masters of the island under their complimentary sulphurous canopy, they proceeded to make the most of their advantage. They converted the occasion to a jubilee, culminating on the arrival of their sovereign.

The Emperor William bade adieu to England on the 8th and sailed direct for his new territory of Heligoland, reaching it on the 10th. His reception was most enthusiastic. His Majesty was entertained by his people at a luncheon. He eulogised the Queen of England to whom, he said, the cession was due and who desired the friendship of Germany. The same evening the Emperor sailed for Wilhelmshaven.

THE employers and the employed at Cardiff having come to terms, the strike is ended.

THE American Silver Act has been brought into operation. The Washington Treasury, on the 13th, purchased 3,10,000 ounces of silver. The offers amounted to one million. The rate is kept a secret, but it is believed to be 113, or slightly above the London rate.

THEY have come upon an extensive coal-field in Silesia.

MR. Cecil Rhodes, the new Prime Minister of British South Africa, is one of the novi homines of the world's plutocracy, though a thorough gentleman for a' that. Educated at Oxford, he left the University direct for South Africa and went up to the newly discovered Diamond Fields. Thus he took the veritable tide which leads on to fortune. As he was one of the earliest, so he became the most successful of the diggers. A man of great ability as well as enterprise and energy, he has been one of the leading figures in South Africa. For the better development of the resources of the Colony, he started the British South Africa Company which has latterly, by his exertions and influence, obtained a charter. He was brought to general notice throughout the world by his princely donation of £10,000 to Mr. Parnell for the Home Rule Fund. Since then, he is known throughout the world as the Diamond King of South Africa, the compeer of the Gold King of Australia, and the Silver King, the Railway King and the Oil King of America.

FLOODS continue. The latest and the heaviest reported is on the Bolan section of the North-Western Railway. The loss of life is great and damage enormous. Six miles of railway have been washed away and the military road obliterated in places. The rush of water was at the rate of twenty miles an hour.

LANDSLIPS have not ceased at Simla. A serious one has just occurred on the Tonga road about seven miles from Simla. The road was blocked entirely for fourteen hours. Tongas can now pass through but no bullock train service is possible. The mails are late by several hours.

THE Government of India is not prepared to proceed with the Leper Bill. It is not satisfied as to the contagious character of the disease and awaits further and definite information.

MR. WARBURTON has commenced the attack on the Tribune. He proceeds not only against the editor and printer, but drags in also the proprietor. Still the Punjab Police man is generous after his kind. He has spared the distributor, the compositor, the proof reader, the inkman, the flyboy, the vendors of the paper on which and the ink with which the journal was printed, and others who had in any way assisted at the production and distribution of the issues complained of. Such issues are nine in number. He does not complain of the nine articles in their entirety but has selected thirteen extracts from them to base his information upon. Four issues are specially named as conveying imputations upon the character and conduct of his deceased mother, which would harm her reputation if living and were intended to be hurtful to his and his children's feelings. The old story! Summonses have been ordered and they are returnable on the 5th September next. The Tribune wrote plainly in the public interest, it knew not Warburton personally, still less did it know the Warburtons, and if it mentioned any of them it did so on information, and there must have been cause for such mention. All this may be assumed without special acquaintanceship with the merits of the case. At the worst, the journal lapsed into indiscretion, considering the state of the law. Under the circumstances, any unfavourable ending of the case against it, is sure to secure it public sympathy and to nullify the effect of the sentence, making the journal more famous.

THE Calcutta municipality voted Rs. 10,000 from borrowed capital to the widow of their deceased servant Mr. Fenwick of the Water Works Department. The Howrah municipality is equally liberal with its funds. It has sanctioned Rs. 1,800 for a bonus to the widow of its Secretary A. Mitchell. The Howrah People's Association, we find, protests against the outlay and has resolved to apply to the District Magistrate to suspend the proceedings of the Commissioners under the municipal Act.

THE Hon'ble Syed Ameer Hossein, C.I.E., has usually been after his friend the Hon'ble Amir Ali, C. I. E. They are, however, in so many respects alike as to be popularly taken for birds of a feather. Both are descendants of the Prophet, both Hon'ble, and both companions of the same Order. The first succeeded the second as a Magistrate in the Calcutta Police Court, as Legislator in the Supreme Council of the Empire, as Secretary of the National Mahomedan Association, and lastly as a Member of the permanent Committee for the supervision of Mahomedan Marriage Registrars and Qazis. This persistent dogging of the new Mahomedan Judge is too much of a good thing even from the best friend. It looks ominous. With all our regard for Hossein we are not Shiah enough to wish such a succession to Ali, natural and appropriate though it be—within a measurable space of time. We are sure, Hossein himself would not, on such terms, succeed Ali on the bench of the High Court. Nor is it necessary to alarm a worthy man. The Government may make our friend a Judge of a District Court.

FROM upcountry comes a not uninteresting story of how a Mahomedan gentleman having gone to law has gone to the wall, before the hearing of his suit proper. There was a difference between a brace of Rahims. Shah Ahmedullah, the Subordinate Judge, Allahabad, had before him a peculiar case the other day. Kazi Abdul Rahim sued Rahim Khan in the second Munsif's court, Allahabad, for a piece of land which he valued at Rs. 5. The Munsif going on leave, the application came before the Subordinate Judge. Against this, Rahim Khan, the principal defendant, urged that the land was worth more than Rs. 250. So the court ordered a local enquiry. Thereupon, the first Rahim, stating his suspicions of the Sub, applied to the District Judge, for transfer of the case to the second Munsif. Mr. Elliot, the Judge, rejected the application. The brave Rahim the Kazi, relying probably on his judicial blood and family traditions, proceeded to take the bull by the horn. Applying to the Sub-Judge himself, he presented to that judicial officer two alternatives, either to transfer the case to the second Munsif's court or to permit him to withdraw from the suit with liberty to institute a fresh one. The petition was considered irregular and was not complied with. Another and a more desperate one was tried, in which, by way of clinching the argument, it was broadly alleged that the Khan Rahim & Co. were very acute persons willing and able to purchase decisions. This was the last straw that broke the poor Sub-Judge's back. He treated the application as contempt of court, and sentenced the plaintiff Rahim to a fine of Rs. 200, or in default of payment, one month's imprisonment.

We dare say the lesson will not be quickly forgotten. It will make the applicant at least more careful, if not absolutely less litigious. But was the second petition on which order was passed in accordance with law?

THE true Reforming Spirit of the day is located in the South. Some of our contemporaries down there are more dreadfully excited over the case of Hari Mohan Maiti. The Southern Star of Tanjore has gone into hysterics and broken out in alliterative indignation. After relating the case, our contemporary says:—

"The circumstances narrated above point to calumnious cannibalism and base barbarism which our countrymen, especially in the North, are privileged to commit and yet go unpunished for the commission by them of what may be called the most disgracefully heinous offence."

"If Hari Mohan's alleged cruelty to, and lustful assassination of, his child-wife were not the proto-type of the only too frequent results of the savage custom of child-marriage, it would not probably have attracted so much public attention and would not possess so much social and national importance as it now has, and his case would be consigned to the 'limbo of oblivion' like a thousand-and-one individual tragedies, that now and then blot the public prints, and are passed off with a wonted stricture or two."

Thus standing convicted of not cannibalism and barbarism only but calumnious anthropophagism and base barbarism, and the habitual indulgence in the savage custom of child-marriage, we of the North have nothing for it but to throw ourselves on the mercy of our betters. As they have allowed us to fatten in our crimes so long, our brethren of the South, Christian as well as Heathen, may possibly permit us a little longer.

Notwithstanding that our contemporary's terms of condemnation are more eloquent than graceful, the writer shows gleams of felicity of phrase. "Lustful assassination of child-wife" is very good.

Our Southern friends are glad that they are not as the Northern barbarians. There is no assumption of mock-modesty but downright jubilation:—

"We are not a little gratified to announce that no such custom exists among the higher classes of our Presidency, and, even among our lower castes, it is a pride to see that the extremely commendable custom of girls marrying only after puberty, and its consummation taking place simultaneously with, or subsequent to it obtains."

But the joy is momentary, and things are not what they seem. We read:—

"But even among some of the higher classes of our Sudras we are grieved to see that high class ignorance and barbarity are being imitated, not unfrequently, openly bringing about thereby the union of a mature husband and an immature wife. To speak more plainly, the Sudras indulge in child-marriages, and among Brahmins, there exist the worthless and the dangerous customs of celebrating mock-puberty ceremonials and nuptials of child-wives, in most cases with a view to save the trouble and the expense of having them performed separately and in due course."

So, after all, the Land of Light does not lie due South. Nor is the Millennium begun already in Madras. The writer comforts himself with the reflection:—

"It is, however, a matter for gratification, that such cases are getting very few and far between day after day; and advancing education bids fair to extirpate them completely at no distant date."

The very truth—but by no means confined to the South, holding good for Benighted Bengal and Enlightened Madras,—for Upper India as for Bombay, for Sind as for the Central Provinces, for British India as Native India. The fact is common to the Empire.

For all that, our contemporary is able to say, we are afraid with justice,—

"But the circumstances in Northern India seem to stand in horrid contrast, and there prevails in those parts the nefarious custom of allowing the child-wife to live with her husband even before puberty. The number of cases of such wife-murders may be very small; but the number of attempts to outrage child-wives is probably too numerous, causing thereby tormenting pain and agony to, if not the death of, many a Foolmoney Dassi. We have no hesitation, therefore, in condemning such a custom in the strongest possible terms, and characterising it as brutal, diabolical and barbarous."

We bow to the chastisement. Although the remarks of contemporaries like the Indian Daily News in the North and the Southern Star and others in the South naturally rile us as members of Hindu society in Bengal, the castigation is not undeserved. It was our own fault that we did not sooner set our house in order, and such writers do a great service to the country and most to ourselves.

To minds brought up in the love and practice of truth, the reading of our Indian newspapers is frequently far from pleasant or instructive, so systematic is truth neglected or, at the best, travestied. The offence is given most in dealing with persons. Flattery prevails to an alarming extent. Big wigs and notabilities of sorts—men risen and men rising—officials, high and low, even to little men dressed in brief authority—powerful men and mischievous men—men of wealth and men of seeming wealth—all are indiscriminately treated to ladlefuls of butter. The article is usually of the "Bazaar" stuff. Nothing comes amiss to a Free Press in Asia. Not only are the veriest lackeys lathered and lubricated into demigods, but the very door posts and railings of Opulence or Influence are attentively pasted with unsightly placards to make them pass for things of beauty and a momentary joy at least. The dead, in particular, are the prey of the Press. Under its peculiar treatment, they are mangled and their faces oftentimes so thoroughly defaced as to be hardly recognizable. All this with the best of intentions, mind you!—that is, if flattery can ever be good,—provided puffing be a proper art, provided it be permissible towards even the dead. In fine, there is little sense of responsibility in those who have access to our public journals, or in their conductors either.

Two of our morning contemporaries have thought fit to accord in their columns a special notice to the appointment of one Baboo Annodaprasad Biswas, of Kharda, (a village in the Barrackpore municipality), as rural

Sub-Registrar of Khatra in the district of Bankoora. The one remarks "This is slow work. It has taken more than ten years to our knowledge to achieve this much, or this little." The other "congratulates the Baboo on his appointment."

It is, however, when treating of the dead that the writers are at their happiest. Then their chord of human nature is struck most violently and they gush most plentifully. Then no end of soft-sawder is brought into service.

THERE is mourning in Anglo-Bihar. Its Demosthenes is dead!—or more properly Erskine. Elegies and epitaphs are appearing on all sides. The khaz Bihar contribution is the boldest of them all. After premising the deceased gentleman's claims on Bihar, to wit, that he "was a friend to most of our leading society members," it lays down the lesson of his life at starting. "Perhaps there has never been a career which has shown more thoroughly than that of the deceased gentleman how much unusual brain power and indomitable pluck can accomplish." The same vein of enthusiasm of appreciation marks the whole. Thus—"As a criminal lawyer he was facile princeps; as an orator his delivery and eloquence were of the very highest order." We are told of "his indomitable will and his wondrous powers of oratory." We are reminded of his "wonderous peroration" in case after case—a work of supererogation, seeing that those oratorical efforts "will not easily be forgotten by those who were privileged to listen." Thus merits are improved and augmented all round in the lips of sorrowing friendship. In the abandon of grief, there is even etymological reduplication. We refer not simply to the recurrence again and again of "wondrous, indomitable," &c. There is doubling of the same words. The lost one's school-days are not only, in true newspaper dialect, his noviciate, but, if possible, more—his "noviciateship."

WE have lost a true lawyer—specially strong in the Regulations—and, what is more, an honest man. Baboo Mohesh Chunder Chowdhry, who died on Thursday, was an old but not an antiquated pleader. Thoroughly upright, and frank almost to imprudence, he was an ardent patriot. He had been ailing for sometime and absented himself from Court since the last Poojas. On receipt of the news, the High Court mourned the event. Two of the Benches—presided over respectively by the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Norris—gave expression to the sentiment. The new Senior Government Pleader and Mr. Twidale replied on behalf of the Pleaders. We spare our readers the effusions of Baboo Hem Chunder Banerjee. The best speech delivered on the occasion was by Mr. Justice Norris. He paid deserving compliment to the worth of the departed. Addressing Mr. Twidale, he said:—

"We have learnt with very deep regret of the loss which your branch of the profession has sustained in the death of its de facto leader. Baboo Mohesh Chunder Chowdhury had practised in this Court and in the Court which preceded it, with advantage to his client and with honor and reputation to himself for a very long series of years. He was a distinguished lawyer, an able advocate, a generous opponent, and a man of high integrity and honesty and uprightness of purpose. His mind was of a more powerful order than the minds of some of those whom it was his duty to address, and this, coupled with the fact that he spoke with great rapidity rendered it at times a matter of difficulty to follow readily many of his numerous arguments, and this occasionally produced a little irritation. But this was something merely superficial; and at the bottom of his heart he was most anxious that nothing should occur to interfere with the friendly relations which ought to exist between the Bench and the Bar. Personally I have received great consideration at his hands, and though it was not my privilege to know him in the intimate way in which I know the members of that branch of the profession to which I belong, I feel in common with you, though not to the same extent, the loss of a friend. I trust his memory will remain fresh and fragrant, and that those of you who are young and just entering upon the battle of life will consider his example well worthy of imitation."

THE Health Officer has quieted the storm that he had raised—but not by his own wand. The quieting wand was supplied by the Advocate-General. He was of opinion that Dr. Simpson had egregiously erred in law in stopping the mehter service of a particular premises and the Commissioners were right in their view of the law that that service could on no account be suspended or refused. At the same time, the Doctor—responsible as he is for the health of the town, and all the more commendable for being enthusiastic in the cause—had not been guilty of improper or insulting language in his Note on the conduct of the Complaints Committee. Nor could he be properly charged with a spirit of defiance of authority for declining to retract the remarks he had been called on to withdraw, seeing that such retractation might be taken for admission of a contumacy which he denied. That refusal put the Commissioners in a fix. They evidently were not prepared for the attitude taken up by the Health-Officer and hesitated to take any extreme step. In this dilemma, they asked the Advocate-General for advice and he found a way out of the difficulty honorable to both sides. Dr. Simpson withdrew his remarks and the Commissioners were satisfied. The town is indebted to Sir Charles Paul for being such an adroit peace-maker. It is no small calamity to a great city to have its municipal corporation at feud with the Health Department.

A CASE of death of a native woman—not girl—by negligence and neglect, for which Hari Mohun Maiti is undergoing imprisonment, is maturing in the Coroner's Court. That supplied materials for agitation against child marriage. This is likely to rake up indignation against the practice known among us as Ganjajatra—carrying the dying to the river bank to die. We don't care; neither is a defensible custom. A Gowalin named Chamatkar, a widow, residing at Con-naghur, lapsed into liaison with the younger brother of her husband named Mohesh Chunder Ghose who has a wife. They all lived under the same roof for one year. But the course of secret, any more than true, love never did run smooth. The widow became enciente, and to prevent a scandal, she was housed with the woman of one Gopee-nath. There she fell ill—how or why there is no evidence yet—and was removed to the Gangabasi-ghat to die a holy death. She, however, did not die immediately, and is said to have given birth to a still born child. Death having delayed to put an end to her troubles, she was next removed to the Eden Hospital, in this city, where she died. Here is the evidence of Mohesh:—

"He said that the deceased was living under his protection for about a year and-a-half. She was living at Gopee's house. He made arrangements with Gopee to keep her in his house, because he (witness) had a wife and could not take her to his house and keep her there. On the 3rd or 4th of Srabun, she was violently purged, and was being convulsed, and then she began to gasp. She became unconscious. He sent for Uzdoo, but he did not come. He then went to call another doctor, Siboo, but he could not meet him. Finding her in a bad condition, all the people advised him to remove her to the ghât, which he did. Siboo doctor attended on her at the ghât, and on the second day he advised him to remove her to the house, but his friend Ram Baboo advised him to remove her to the Medical College Hospital. He never threatened him (Ram Baboo) with violence if he did not remove her to the hospital. He then brought her to the hospital. She was three days at the ghât."

By the bye, we hope the European reader will not jump to the conclusion that these unsavoury Ghoses are kinsmen or any relations whatever of the Ghoses of the High Court, on the bench or the bar.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 16, 1890.

CARDINAL NEWMAN.

Siste, viator! heroem calcas! Even so we would admonish the good reader on the leading news of the week by telegraph: we need scarcely say we refer to the death of Cardinal Newman. The projected tour of the Czarewitch through the Eastern World, from Roum to Far Cathay unto the Island-Empire of the Pacific—the return home from Britain of the Great Kaiser of Central Europe—are of feeble interest in comparison; even the strikes and the mutinies in England, the Behring Sea dispute and the commencement of operations under the Silver Act are matters of minor importance. In fine, the movements and proceedings of Princes and Ministers of State are nothing before the, in every sense, eventual rest of the humble minister to minds diseased and Prince of the Church. The restless traveller on the road of the world, engrossed each in his special pursuit, must pause to join in the funeral honours accorded by appreciative humanity to the departed hero. A hero he was beyond question, in all true senses. No fighter with carnal weapons against mortal incarnations by any means, but a true fighter for all that with sublimer instruments in the Crusade against Darkness and the Powers of Evil. No military man, to be sure, but a knight of the Church militant, attacking with the words of scripture and the annals and traditions of Primitive and Mediæval Christianity, and, above all, darting the penetrating rays of an enlightened and holy consciousness.

With John Henry Newman, not only a great soul goes out but the light of not one but many generations—the master-mind of the age is buried. He was as old as the Modern Era from the height of the Great French Revolution. He was the Avatar of the Nineteenth Century—its embodiment in flesh and blood. Born in 1801, he was the twin brother of our cycle. Morally he was the father of the Age. The personal link between the Eighteenth Century and the Twentieth Century in embryo, he functioned as the destroyer of the Spirit of the former Period—the iconoclast of its gods. Consciously or unconsciously, yet certainly, he was the most formidable foe of the influences amid which he was born and brought up. He was not always the same; his lucid intelligence was early tickled by the easy rationalism of the day, his susceptibility quickly caught the prevailing malaria, but he struggled with brave sincerity and freed himself: his mind was, however, too subtle not to be disturbed by its own activity or wounded by its own keenness; anon he was assailed, doubts of another kind perplexed him, and again he had to work out his own redemption. But in one thing he was steady and thorough throughout—his teaching was always opposed to the teaching—his life was a standing protest against the life—of the Eighteenth Century.

He was not exactly first in the field. The pioneer teacher was Coleridge, and he found such gifted disciples as Sterling, the Hares, Maurice, and last not least Carlyle. But Newman was the most eminent theologian of them all as well as the greatest reasoner, and he precipitated what was vague and nebulous, crystallizing it, giving it substance and form and shape. The Critique of Kant was the first effective answer to that formidable Rationalism which, although first fathered upon the French and since attributed to Germany, really arose in Great Britain. But the philosophy of the British schools and their developments at the hands of the French Encyclopædists were only scotched but far from consumed. German Transcendentalism first swamped them, and Coleridge was not only the Prometheus who stole—yes stole—the new blue light and carried it to his mother country but was also the Prophet of the new message finally for the whole world and the present century. For he imparted of his own oil to the torch he had filched and kindled it to greater vitality than ever, and in course of time lamps from it crossed over to the Continent, till the light was recognised and welcomed back in the land of its origin. Thus the new Philosophy of Reverence discredited the Philosophy of Doubt and Despair. Thus the doctrine of the Supernatural advanced conquering into the hitherto unquestioned empire of a narrow Naturalism. Coleridge not only popularised the mighty Mysticism and utilised it into the domain of Art and Belles Letters, but also introduced it into the domain of Theology. Thus he revived the drooping spirits of churchmen and brought hope to the Church. He made it possible for his followers to rekindle the Faith into a splendour unknown since the days of the early Fathers. Whitlock and Wesley had done likewise, if not the same. Their influence had been extraordinary; their conversion of souls, making every allowance for theatricality and hysterics, was a good deal real. Their practice gave the best answer to Gibbon's famous sarcasm about the proselytising of the Northern Europeans by platoons and battalions. For at each preaching they re-baptised in spirit by villages and districts. For the first time after ages, the gospel became a living power for the regeneration of the inner man. But the cost of their success was enormous—to loyal Anglicans forbidding. The leaders of English Methodism rescued the Faith at the expense of the Church. Not so Coleridge and the Coleridgians. They tenderly loved the Establishment, if not as a Divine arrangement at least as a national institution—above all a historic relic. They were no mercenary ministers of a vain Worship who must volens nolens bolster up the cause of a rotten Temple. They were the fond children of a venerable and venerated Mother. So they preached up the Church with all their heart and all their might. But a Church is nothing—it is, recondite dogmas apart, but an organization of labour, a community and a communion—even a creed is nothing without faith—without fervour. This the Coleridgean Organ was able to contribute. The apostles of Methodism, again, only moved the masses. As the old Puritan was despised of the Cavaliers and the wits, even though the greatest Poet and most learned polemic of the age was its spokesman, so the new Evangelicalism is discredited of the accomplished and the learned, even though supported by some of the greatest writers and most eloquent divines and any number of successful preachers. The cultivated classes regard the triumphs of Revivalism as either a trick or a disease, and altogether a worthless affair. The contempt, indeed, is admitted as a fact, and vigorous minds like John Foster have set themselves to trace the causes of the phenomenon. Accordingly, Evangelicalism was a one-sided victory, and on the whole a doubtful progress. For while it embraced the people—often the very dregs of the people—it failed with the higher classes. The men of intellect and culture steadily fell off from the Faith, as the gossier part of society returned to it with seeming zeal. Evangelicalism might be a blessing, but it was plainly not the whole blessing. The desideratum was supplied by the new interpretation of theology. Coleridgism—to give a necessarily complex product a handy name—appealed to the cultivated intelligence, and appealed to it, as the event proved, successfully, indeed, with astonishing success. Of course, it tended to Esotericism. At any rate, it not only supported the Establishment but saved the Creed. The effect of this triumph travelled far and wide beyond the limits of Christendom. Religion itself was saved—religion in its most general sense, independent of particular forms of worship or methods of maintaining and propagating dogmas.

After the earlier pioneers, Newman was the greatest representative of the new spirit. He developed the doctrine and carried the movement to its farthest possibilities, until he is believed by many to have led back the human soul captive to primitive darkness and reimposed on it worse than Mediæval fetters. By chains of the most subtle reasoning delivered in pellucid and winning language, he has re-established a substantial belief in the most extravagant of old women's fables. He has routed the Spinozas and Humes, the Bayles and Voltaires. Hume confounded the world when he asserted the impossibility of miracles on the ground of their involving violations of the order and laws of Nature. The audacious Newman is not content to show the great Scot to be no better than the typical North Briton, wrong and dull witted. He not only establishes the possibility, or even the enormous probability, but the imminent likelihood of our any day, in the course of each individual experience, being confronted by a miracle which there might be no gainsaying. According to him, the age of miracles is not past. That itself is a feat of which any intellect might be proud. Nor is it a vain trick of reasoning. Mark the effect! Scepticism has been terribly chastised—bullied, cuffed, kicked, throttled—to the heart's content of the reverent. Newman has not crushed and will not crush Scepticism, but he has certainly divided the empire, with the lion's share for Faith. Indeed, he has demolished one scepticism to raise another. In destroying the pretensions of the Logic of Materialism, he has actually discredited Reason itself as an organ for the discovery of truth. He is the greatest Apostle of Humility to the Cultivated Classes.

THE HOLIDAYS.

HAVING sanctioned the mischief, the Government of India is willing to make the withdrawal of the Doorga Pooja holidays as unirksome to its Hindu employes as is possible under the circumstance. Hence the following notification dated Simla, the 24th July 1890 :—

"The Governor-General in Council hereby notifies that on the following days during 1890, which are not declared by the Government of Bengal to be 'public holidays' under section 25 of the Negotiable Instruments Act, 1881, the offices directly subordinate to the Government of India at Calcutta, with the exception of

- (1) The Office of Issue of the Paper Currency Department,
 - (2) The Office of the Comptroller and Auditor-General,
- shall be closed :—

I.—MUHAMMADAN HOLIDAYS.

Idus-Zuha, which falls on the 28th July or, if the moon be not visible on the 18th July, on the 29th July.

Muharram, the last two days of which fall on the 26th and 27th August or, if the moon be visible on the 16th August, on the 25th and 26th August.

Eid-ul-Fitr, which falls on the 27th October or, if the moon be not visible on the 15th October, on the 28th October.

II.—HINDU HOLIDAYS.

Durga Puja, the 18th, 24th, and 25th October.

Lakhi Puja, the 29th October.

III.—GENERAL HOLIDAY.

The day preceding Christmas Day, the 24th December."

If the Long Vacation is to be permanently abolished and brought down to only four days, there are good reasons against the operation in the current year. The holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act maintaining in full the Doorga Pooja vacation were announced in December last, and such an authority so opposed to the vacation as the Bank of Bengal, "the best judge," according to the Bengal Government, "of the requirements of the commercial public," was not for curtailing it in the present year, lest it interfere with business already transacted on the December notification. Besides, there ought to be sufficient notice, at least of a year, to all Hindus of the departure by Government from the old accustomed course. The question has a wider aspect than the holiday reformers would give it. It affects the whole Province, not merely the Hindu employes under Government. Sir Stuart Bayley is made to say—"The Lieutenant-Governor has the strongest sympathy with the very general desire of the Hindu community that no obstacle should be placed by Government in the way of its Hindu employes meeting together at their homes, at the season of the Doorga Poojah holidays, for the celebration of religious, social, and domestic ceremonies. It is far from His Honor's desire to encourage any policy which would deprive Hindu employes as a body of the satisfaction of enjoying their great annual festival in the future as they have done in the past. There is nothing, however, in the proposals now made which, in the Lieutenant-Governor's opinion, is likely to lead to any such unfortunate result. It is true that a few clerks employed in a few offices may be subjected to some inconvenience by being required to attend office on days on which they now get a holiday. But the inconvenience is one which they must bear in the public interest. They will enjoy some compensating advantages." We have yet to learn that the Doorga Pooja holidays are not in the public interest. Sir Stuart Bayley unconsciously perpetrates the wrong which he thinks ought not to be done. He lays the axe to the root of the great festival and thinks he preserves it. An open oppressor of his subjects could not have adopted a worse method for the suppression of the holidays. The key to the whole Government argument seems to be the advice of some of the heads of Departments to their Hindu subordinates to perform their religious ceremonies—marriages and shrads for instance—on Sundays, that the office may not suffer from their absence in week days for the said purposes. It is a mistake to suppose that the hardship will be confined to Hindus. The Dootja Pooja holiday is no longer a Hindu holiday. It is a vacation for all Her Majesty's subjects in Bengal and is a part of their existence. We hope Government will not stick to the second notification because it has been issued, and think the second thought is the best. In matters like these, no thought of whatever degree can be the last or best.

Last year we thought it due to obscure merit to bring to prominent notice one of the minor notabilities in the great Congress agitation—we allude to Gangaprasad Varma, the volunteer Congress Publisher. Many doubtless smiled at our making so much of a mere printer, regarding it as of a piece with our habitual extravagance. If we have sinned, we have sinned after our Rishi ancestors who were never weary of dwelling on the essential and invaluable service given to Rama, the earliest Aryan invader of the South, in his expedition to Ceylon. Nor is the service of the printer contemptible service in any sense. Publication is the very nourishment of popular movements. It is life itself to the Congress. What is the vitality of a nebulous mass, not to say so disorganised rabble of miscellaneous, chiefly nondescript, elements but the publication of its proceedings or of its members?

Mr. Varma has added another to the long list of his Congress publications. If the Congress is worth anything, its proceedings are not only worth reporting but historiographing. If the Congress found in Varma its Publisher, Varma has found for it its Historiographer. Here, at least, before us is the record of the doings of the great patriotic Kumbh mela of Allahabad. They were important enough for recital, and they have been very well recited in the brochure. We say this not because the bulk of the account appeared in our columns. But "B" has a knack at sketching persons, and at his happiest is remarkably smart.

We are not afraid of giving examples from the booklet at random. Thus we have at p. 5 :—

"The Congress has not only outlived the calumny of its traducers, both official and non-official, it has also outgrown, we are once again in a position to assert, its originally contemplated dimensions. About 1,300 delegates were present. The number of delegates generally was more than double; the number of Mahomedan delegates had trebled itself this year. Is it merely for serio-comic performances that these 1,300 delegates came—some of them from the farthest corners of India, from Peshawar and Travancore? Can the rankest opponents of the Congress deny that this annual assemblage of the best and the most enlightened in the land—the galaxy of Indian geniuses—represents one of the best, if not the best, phase of the British rule in India? To assume that those who have been the recipients of the greatest good at the hands of the British Government, should come all the way and meet annually openly to preach sedition against the very Government, which has been the making of them, tantamounts to this: that the seed of English education sown by Macaulay, Trevelyan and others has fallen upon barren ground, and that a century-and-a-half of British rule could not make a better impression upon the people. This is the standpoint of our opponents, and it involves a condemnation both of English education and English rule. But we of the Congress take our stand upon a different and, as we believe, a higher platform. We are deeply grateful for the past blessings and past advantages; we now claim for more. We no longer regard the British Government as an alien Government, but look upon it as a national Government. English is our lingua franca: of English institutions we have become deeply enamoured; and, as we have been trained upon lines peculiarly British, we cannot do aught but ask for the privileges of British citizenship. Now, which view is more creditable to the British nation? To argue that a grateful nation like the Indians, whose obliging and grateful nature has passed into the regions of History and Philosophy and who are easily contented to a proverb, who have deified their smallest benefactors, which fact, according to Sir Alfred Lyall (Vide his Asiatic Studies), explains for the thirty-three crores of Indian gods and goddesses—to argue that such a race is dissatisfied with British rule, is cursing it with bell, book and candle! It is not true that we see no good in British rule; on the contrary, we see much, and naturally wish for more. We feel and wish that our interests be indissolubly bound up with those of the English. Our argument is that there is still room for improvement, and our confident faith is that our prayers for reform, not revolution, will not be refused. If it were true that the secret ambition of the Congress was the overthrow of the British Government, no Europeans would be found taking part in it, there would be no Hume, Adam, Norton, Howard, Kennedy, Hearsey, Atkins; there would be no Christian converts, Kalicharan Bannerjee, Ram Chandra Bose, David Mohun, Peter Paul Pillay; no man enjoying high position and honor, Sir T. Madhava Rao, K.C.S.I., W. C. Bonnerjee, the Hon'ble K. T. Telang, C.I.E., the Hon'ble Govinda Ranade, the Hon'ble S. Subramaniya Iyer, the Hon'ble P. Mehta, the Hon'ble Pandit Ajodhya Nath; no landholder having a permanent interest in the country, as the Maharaja of Durbhanga, Sheikh Raza Hossein Khan, Raja Rampal Singh, Sirdar Dayal Singh, Raja Tejnarain Singh, and many others of this class whose names must never see the light of day but who are nevertheless supporting the Congress with men (yes with men!) and money; bankers like Lala Ram Charan; and, last but not the least, the Bengalees whose worst enemies have not denied them the possession of a keen intellect, and who have little to gain and almost everything to lose, by subversion of the British Government."

Behold! here comes the great Shivaprasad!

"It may not be generally known, but it is a fact that the Raja was one of the earliest depositors of the delegate's fee. He not only paid his Rs. 10, but paid another ten rupees for any 'indigent delegate. Prolonged conversation went on with him and that sturdy taluqdar patriot—the citizen Singh, Raja Rampal. But nothing practical came out of it. Less than a month ago, this very man was the central figure of a movement to damn the Congress. What made him to change sides in the interim? Was it the fiasco in which the Lucknow demonstration ended?—or was it the exchange of angry and even obscene words between him and Sir Syed? Be his motives whatever they may, there he was in our midst—as a staunch Congresswalla. True, none counted him for much. His adhesion was regarded by all as an accession of weakness rather than of strength—in short, he was rated at his true worth. There was not one redeeming feature in the antecedents of this mealy-mouthed patriot. A consistent supporter of everything for which there could be found an official standing up, a notorious turn-coat, a profound calculator, a born time-server of the bania class, how could any man pin his faith upon him? And he by his subsequent conduct more than justified our misgivings. For some reasons not known, he did not turn up on the inaugural day, the 26th. On the 27th also he was looked for in vain at the opening time. It was sometime after noon, business had commenced, the Hon'ble K. T. Telang had already riveted the attention of the audience by the flood of eloquence that he was pouring forth, and a perfect silence reigned throughout the vast hall, when a gate-keeper brought a notice to Raja Rampal who went out. In another moment lo and behold! the very Raja Siva Prasad, supported by Raja Rampal Singh, was seen entering the hall. This was the signal for a few suppressed hisses. Raja Rampal conducted him to a seat by him near the Reporter's Lodge. He then sat down and began to attack Raja Rampal with repeated questions to the evident annoyance of the latter. Next rose Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee, whose wordy torrent filled the whole audience, not excepting the unimpressible titular Raja, with a vague excitement more akin to animal spirits than intellectual satisfaction. Some other speakers followed him, when arose Raja Siva Prasad and solicited permission to speak a few words. He ascended the platform amidst hisses and groans which Mr. W. C. Bonnerjee, assisted by Babu Surendra Nath Banerjee and others, managed to stop with great difficulty. But when the audacious Siva Prasad went on, perfectly heedless of, and indifferent to, all these, as if he was used to this kind of treatment, and brought forward his proposal for the suppression of the very Congress, all at once the pent-up feelings of the 6,000 persons sitting beneath the pandal burst out with a fury. For a time, all order was lost, and it seemed as if quiet could not again be restored. It was a moment of sore trial both to Raja Siva Prasad and to those upon whom he tried to palm off his view and thus win a diplomatic victory. Not only the delegates but even the visitors, who were strictly forbidden to signify their assent to, or dissent from, any proposal, for a time forgot themselves and became awfully excited. Many were prepared to hurl their shoes at him, but wiser counsels prevailed. The silver ringing voice of Bonnerjee availed not, the thundering admonition of Surendra and the Hon'ble Pandit Ayodhya Nath's stentorian warning fared hardly better, Hume's cry for 'order' was drowned in the universal din, when the repeated sound of the gong brought the people to their senses. For a few moments the pandal was a scene of utter confusion and disorder."

Again :—

"Hush! he is speaking. Now I am more than ever convinced that it is certainly not Raja Siva Prasad that is speaking, whoever else it may be. He has a louder, a steadier voice, a less faltering accent. See he is coming. Let us try if we can recognise the perspiring figure, reddened by this physical and moral struggle. He takes his seat piteously asking for the reporter of the Pioneer. Bah! before me stands, still oscillating like the pendulum of a clock, the self-same Raja Siva Prasad—yes, the very person who thirty years ago was selected for his voice to read out the Royal Proclamation of 1858 in Benares. How signally and miserably his voice failed him to-day! Such is the stifling and paralysing impotency of a vicious intrigue! He would not for the fear of his very life go without an escort of notable Congresswallas. Mr. Bhimji and Captain Banon conducted him to a safe distance in his conveyance, or which is the same, the old Maharaja of Benares's conveyance."

Those who wish to study the personal peculiarities and characters of the most eminent living Indians, cannot do better than buy a copy each of this Congress Sketches.

PUBLIC HOLIDAYS IN BENGAL.

20. The Negotiable Instruments Act XXVI of 1881 became law subsequent to the discussions of 1879 and 1880. Under section 25 of that Act, when the day on which a Promissory Note or bill of exchange is at maturity is a public holiday, the instrument shall be deemed to be due on the next preceding business day. The expression "public holiday" includes Sundays, New Year's Day, Christmas Day, Good Friday, and any other day declared by the Local Government by notification in the official Gazette to be a public holiday. Under this section the 30 authorised public holidays in Bengal are now published, and the gravamen of the Chamber is, firstly, that public business is to a large extent paralysed during these holidays by the closing of the Exchange Banks, which will not undertake the responsibility of transacting business during days upon which negotiable instruments will not mature; and, secondly, that the trade of the port is materially affected by the closure of the Shipping Office and the inability to obtain port clearance during these days. It is pointed out that in the interval from 30th September to 10th October 1889, which were declared public holidays under the Act on account of the Doorga and Lakhi Poojahs in 1889, the shipping arrivals in the port of Calcutta showed a gross tonnage of 73,210, and a registered tonnage of 48,179; that the departures showed 63,962 gross and 45,538 registered tonnage; that 29 steamers and 2 ships arrived in port, and that 19 steamers and 13 ships left the port. The East Indian Railway brought into the market 25,084 tons of goods, and the Eastern Bengal State Railway 4,52,514 maunds, of which 3,63,875 were jute. The fact that all bills maturing in the interval fell due on Saturday, September 28th, is brought to notice as a most serious inconvenience and burden on the trade of the port. In the discussion that took place in 1879 much stress was laid by the native members of the Committee on the fact that the then existing facilities were sufficient. They urged that, though the Banks were closed, exchange operations might be and were carried on, and, that as a matter of fact, the Banks did take cheques from purchasers of bills during the vacation; and that remittances by telegram or otherwise were not necessarily suspended. The Chamber urge that this is not now the case, and that the Banks have felt it unsafe to do any business at all on holidays gazetted under the Negotiable Instruments Act since that Act came into operation, and consequently that the inconvenience to commerce has become intensified.

21. Of the force of these representations there can be no doubt; and it is equally clear that it is the duty of the Government to mitigate the grievance if it is possible to do so without imposing greater hardship on others. The question to be examined is whether this can be done by reducing the number of public holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act, and at the same time increasing the number given in Government offices by the executive order of Government. Mahomedan holidays are now granted by the executive order of Government in the following way:—"It is notified for general information that," on specified dates, "all public offices and Revenue and Magisterial Courts in Bengal, with the exception of the offices of Collector of Customs, Shipping Master, the Registrar of Assurances, Calcutta, the Collector of Stamp Revenue, Calcutta, the Stamping Department of the Office of the Superintendent of Stamps, Calcutta, and the Salt Rowanah and Opium Sale Departments of the Board of Revenue, shall be closed." The effect of these orders is to give a general holiday in Government offices with the exception of those specified. To those excepted offices special instructions are issued that "though it is not expedient to close them on the days in question, it is hoped that it will be possible to arrange to relieve of their duties on those days any Mahomedan ministerial officers who may apply for leave." The holidays are granted generally, but the trade of the port is not allowed to suffer. It is an arrangement which His Honour believes has been found to give satisfaction to all concerned. What the Lieutenant-Governor would now propose for consideration is that all those days of the Doorga Poojahs, which are not actually required to be devoted to necessary Hindu religious ceremonies, should be notified as holidays in the same way as Mahomedan holidays are now notified, and that only those days which are devoted to religious ceremonies should be notified as public holidays under the Act.

22. An objection which may be brought against this proposal is that on Poojah days, which are not notified under the Act as public holidays, every bank and mercantile office in the city will be kept open. This is the argument which was felt to have so much weight in the discussions of 1879-80. But the objection is less strong than it seems to be. The Banks would be in no worse position—indeed in a better one in regard to enforced closing—than they were in before the Act was passed; whatever force attached to the argument used by the native members of the Committee as to their being able to afford sufficient facilities to commerce without absolutely closing their doors, would acquire additional strength under the present proposal; while in regard to mercantile offices, the Lieutenant-Governor is disposed to doubt whether there will be any very material change. All the merchants in Calcutta now require so many of their clerks as are necessary to carry on business to attend during the holidays; business is not allowed to stop, notwithstanding the closure of the Exchange Banks and Shipping Office; and the Lieutenant-Governor is assured on competent authority that the reduction of the number of holidays under the Act is not likely to appreciably affect the actual attendance of clerks. The merchants of Calcutta have always been ready to give holidays during the days actually devoted to religious ceremonial observance, and all employees in merchants' offices now know very well that a condition of their service is that on other days they are expected to attend office when work has to be done.

23. Sir Stuart Bayley has no doubt that the mercantile community will continue to show every reasonable consideration to their Hindu clerks in regard to attendance. It is to their interest to do so: the work of their offices depends on mutual agreement on both sides. After all, attendance in office is a matter of contract arrangement between employer and servant, and it is impossible to justify any interference on the part of Government, which would insist on mercantile offices remaining without clerks for twelve days at a time. Of course no such interference is really contemplated, but the papers on the subject give some colour for supposing that the claim has sometimes been made. If it is formally abandoned, the objection under discussion must also be given up.

24. On the other hand, I am to point out that a notification in the proposed form will enable Government to give a general holiday in its own offices, excepting those only which are required to remain partially, or it may be wholly, open to meet the exigencies of commerce. All that is expected from Government is to afford reasonable facilities for carrying on business. This is done in the case of Mahomedan holidays, and ought to be done in the case of Hindu social festivals. The number of Government offices affected is inconsiderable, and the amount of hardship which would be inflicted on the Hindu employees concerned would not be great. The Lieutenant-Governor would, however, strictly enjoin in regard to these excepted offices that the Hindu employees should be allowed their holidays, whenever possible, and that, if it be found impossible to grant them, other concessions in the way of leave at other times should be given.

25. A point which had great weight in influencing the decision in 1879 was that advanced by Mr. Dampier and others that the opening of certain offices at the Presidency would necessarily govern the practice of all or nearly all the other offices in Bengal. It is now argued that this position is no longer tenable as shown by the fact that certain Mahomedan holidays are granted by executive order, and as, as a matter of fact, universally enjoyed in all parts of Bengal, except in certain offices at the Presidency. The opening of these particular offices does not in any way govern the practice elsewhere. It appears to follow that certain Hindu holidays, if notified in the same way as Mahomedan holidays are now accepted, and it is urged there is an opportunity of settlement on this basis. The provisions of the Negotiable Instruments Act enable the Government to make a clear distinction between public holidays notified under the Act and holidays notified by executive order; and it seems to His Honour that advantage may be taken of this distinction, which did not exist when the question was formerly under discussion, to sanction arrangements which, while recognizing the claims of the Hindu community, will also satisfy the interests of trade and commerce.

26. It is undoubtedly the case that the attitude of the Chamber becomes a stronger one every year. The proportion of steamers which comes into the port constantly increases, and the requirements of trade are more urgent now than they were ten years ago. The holiday arrangements are proportionately more irksome and impose greater comparative restrictions than they did then. The claims of commercial progress are recognized in other parts of India. It was pointed out by Baboo Kristo Das Pal and Durga Charan Law in 1879 that "the number of holidays in Bengal is less than that in other provinces." But whatever may have been the case in 1879, the exact reverse is the fact in 1889. The number of holidays for 1889 notified under the Negotiable Instruments Act in Madras (including New Year's Day, Good Friday and Christmas Day, which are public holidays under the Act) was 18; in Bombay the number was 21; in Bengal the number was 29. A prima facie case is therefore made out for reduction in the number of public holidays notified under the Act. If the number of Doorga Poojah and Lakhi Poojah holidays gazetted under the Act were reduced from 12 to 5, there would still remain 22 public holidays in Bengal, which is a larger number than either at Bombay or Madras, and is, the Lieutenant-Governor understands, a larger number than is allowed in any other country in the civilized world.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—As winter advances and the weather becomes more and more inclement and trying the earliest evidences of ill-health must be immediately checked and removed, or a slight illness may result in a serious malady. Relaxed and sore throat, quinsy, influenza, chronic cough, bronchitis, and most other pulmonary affections will be relieved by rubbing this cooling Ointment into the skin as nearly as practicable to the seat of mischief. This treatment, simple yet effective, is admirably adapted for the removal of these diseases during infancy and youth. Old asthmatic invalids will derive marvellous relief from the use of Holloway's remedies, which have wonderfully relieved many such sufferers, and re-established health after every other means had signally failed.

27. The Chamber of Commerce have proposed that the total number of public holidays notified under the Act should be reduced to 12 days only as specified in their recommendation, and they have declared that these 12 days "shall be the holidays recognized by the Chamber under shipping orders and charter parties as holidays according to the custom of the port." But the Lieutenant-Governor is not aware of any reason why Government should accept so great a change as this. The Chamber are at liberty to declare what charter party holidays they please; but they cannot expect that the Government should regulate the public holidays throughout the province according to the custom of the Calcutta port. It appears that in Madras the public holidays under the Act are identical with the charter party holidays declared by the Chamber of Commerce. In Bombay, however, the local Chamber of Commerce have fixed the number of their charter party holidays at 14, while the Bombay Government has notified the number of public holidays to be 21. Similarly in Bengal there can be no objection to the Chamber fixing the number of holidays according to the custom of the port at 12, while the number of public holidays may be 22, or any other number notified by Government under the Act. Moreover, it has been stated that a reduction in the number of continuous Doorga Poojah public holidays will sufficiently meet the contention of the Chamber, which is not so much against the total number of holidays in the year as against the obstruction to business occasioned by the occurrence of 12 public holidays in succession. Although objection has been taken to the continuous character of the Christmas holidays which, now when Sundays are included, usually amount to five days in succession, it has not been pressed home with the same persistence as the objection to the Doorga Poojah holidays, which are at present also continuous and are more than twice as long in duration. It is only in regard to the Doorga Poojahs, therefore, that the Lieutenant-Governor is disposed at present to consent to any reduction in the number of public holidays under the Act. The other public holidays might remain unchanged for the present. It is desired by the Chamber that if any change is made it should take effect from the year 1890, and the Lieutenant-Governor proposes to take action as he may be advised in this respect.

28. I am to sum up this letter as follows :—

It is proposed to notify holidays in Bengal under two separate notifications: first, in regard to public holidays notified as such under the Negotiable Instruments Act; and, secondly, in regard to holidays which are notified as such by the closure of public offices. These two separate notifications would be in the form given, and apply to the days specified in the draft notifications annexed.

In addition to any remarks on the general question which may be offered, the Lieutenant-Governor desires to be favoured with an opinion on the following points :—

- (1)---Whether the effect of the publication of these notifications will be to make a clear distinction between public holidays under the Negotiable Instruments Act and those notified by executive order only, in so far that the Exchange Banks will remain closed on the "public holidays" only, and not on the other days.
- (2)---Whether the effect of the publication of these notifications will wholly or partially meet the growing requirements of trade and commerce.
- (3)---Whether the effect of the publication of these notifications will be to inflict serious hardship on a considerable section of the community by depriving them of holidays which they now enjoy.
- (4)---Whether the proposals now made are accepted by the Chamber or your Association as a reasonable present compromise between interests which admittedly conflict with one another.

29. The third question, as to the effect on the general community of notifying the non-compulsory days of the Doorga Poojah as holidays by executive action instead of under the Negotiable Instruments Act, is the most important, and that to which your attention is specially invited. The Lieutenant-Governor would in no case make a change without the previous sanction of the Government of India, and he desires to lay the question before His Excellency in Council with the fullest light that previous enquiry can throw upon it.

30. In conclusion, I am to say that the Lieutenant-Governor will be glad to obtain an answer to this letter at the Chamber's (Association's) early convenience.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SUNSET.

SWEET star of summers' eventide !
O'er yonder sea of light,
Where many a cloudlet crimson dyed
Is cradled on the night.

And back from many a purple isle
The darkness rolleth for awhile,
As sunset o'er that billowy sea
Unveils her heart of hearts to thee ;

I watched thy coming, long ago,
When but a pensive child,
Where Vincent's dark blue mountains glow
By Huron wide and wild,

And softly, lovingly as now,
The night dew kissed my throbbing brow ;
I felt with bird and breeze and bower
The witchery of the sunset hour.

Oh, far off home of boyhood's dreams !
Dear land remembered long !
The magic of thy mountain streams,
The valleys filled with song ;

Through blighted hope, through pain and tears,
Through wandering and through burdened years
Denied, unsought, and tempest driven,
Ye tell of rest and home in Heaven.

To-night !—and such a night as this—
His touch on yonder skies,
Where clouds are bathed in Eden bliss,
And stars in splendor rise ;

I bless Him, in the bonds He's cleft ;
The wealth of hope, of joy that's left ;
The shield and shelter ever nigh ;
The peace that cometh by and by.

I turn from these, Thy works, to Thee,
A refuge of our race !
If earthly scenes be fair to see,
What is Thy dwelling place ?

The glowing sunset's crimson light ;
The splendor of the starry night ;
The rainbow, arched from zone to zone,
Are shadows only of thy throne.

Thou stoapest with a tender heart
To every little thing ;
A refuge and a rock Thou art,
A father and a king !

Did not life's darkness dim our sight ;
Its sorrows hide Thine own sweet light,
How much of goodness could we see ?
How much of love that tells of Thee ?

OUTWARD BOUND.

I dwell far inland, but I feel
The ocean breeze around me blow,
I hear the dashing of a keel
Through billows white as drifted snow.
I see the sunshine through the spray,
For one I love has sailed to-day !

O restless waters, lightly bear
So dear a burden on your breast !
Float cheerily in the soft, spring air,
O starry pennon of the West !
Let only halcyon breezes play
With heaving wave and tide to-day.

Bloom, heather, on the Scottish moors,
Wake, violets, in dear English dells,
The heart that seeks your storied shores
With all a poet's fervour swells ;
High hopes illumine with rainbow ray
The broad, bright ocean path to-day.

And if at times a thought of me
Shall, swift and still, the wanderer meet,
O sunbeam, starbeam ! faithfully
That thought in many hues repeat,
My heart must follow on its way
The fair ship outward bound to-day.

FRANCES L. MACE.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are remedies which should invariably be taken by travellers in search of health, pleasure or business. Many deleterious influences are constantly at work in foreign climes, tending to deteriorate the health ; these and the altered conditions of life will entail on those who travel the necessity of carefully attending to early symptoms of disease, and they will find the use of these remedies to be highly necessary, the action of the Pills being purifying and strengthening and of great service in cases of fever, ague, and all inflammatory diseases, whilst the Ointment is a sovereign cure in cases of piles, bad legs, bad breasts, wounds and ulcers. Holloway's remedies do not deteriorate by change of climate.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

WE have much pleasure in opening our prose columns this week with the following impressive lesson in practical morality, culled from our miscellaneous reading :—

"A worthy old colored woman, in the city of New York, was one day walking along the street quietly smoking her pipe. A jovial sailor, rendered a little mischievous by liquor, came sawing down, and when opposite the old woman, saucily pushed her aside, and with a pass of his hand knocked the pipe out of her mouth. He then halted to hear her fret at his trick, and enjoy a laugh at her expense. But what was his astonishment when she meekly picked up the pieces of her broken pipe, without the least resentment in her manner; and giving him a dignified look of mingled sorrow, kindness and pity, said, 'God forgive you, my son, as I do!' It touched a tender chord in the heart of the rude tar. He felt ashamed, condemned and repentant. The tear started in his eye; he must make reparation. He heartily confessed his error; and thrusting both hands into his full pockets of change, forced the contents upon her, exclaiming, 'God bless you, kind mother, I'll never do so again!'"

NO end to Parsee liberality! The latest act in this direction is that of the good Awabai Pai, wife of Mr. Cawasjee, Bazonjee Curranee, who has given Rs. 10,000 towards a fire-temple, in course of construction on the Giraum Road, for the services of the Bhegaria section of the Parsee community. Rs. 8,000 has been laid out in buying a house for the priests, which has been provided with a well at Rs. 1,000 and the remaining Rs. 1,000 has been invested for the regular performance of some religious rites.

THE Englishman's Fund for the Balacava Heroes, up to date, amounts to Rs. 6,325-4. A Canadian, J. Williams, resident over 38 years in Victoria, writes to the Melbourne Age, in connection with the subject, thus :—

"I have always regarded a peaceful settlement of disputes between nations, where practicable, by arbitration and international law as far preferable to warfare and bloodshed. But, Sir, when I read the accounts of the state of destitution in which the few remaining heroes of the Light Brigade are so pitilessly allowed to suffer, I freely confess that for very shame of our nation's ingratitude and heartlessness big tears streamed down my cheeks. We, who daily sing, in those powerful strains of Tennyson, the praises of these men, yet treat them thus. What good comes from grand poetic lines after this? How empty is all this boastful appreciation of bravery and devotion to duty and country, when it goes no further than professions in song. When a nation fails to truly appreciate its heroes in any department of public service, it may soon be found helpless and honourless. Let us in this remote part show a truer appreciation for these brave men in helpless old age, and by liberal contributions try to awaken our countrymen in Great Britain to a better sense of their duty. Without sentiment, without feeling, without love of country and proper appreciation of its benefactors, and without heart and gratitude, is to be on a level with the mere brute creation. Forsooth the faithfulness, true devotion and attachment of a Newfoundland dog puts such character to shame. Enclosed is 20s. as a contribution."

M. LOUIS LEOPOLD OLIVER, a young aeronaut, has just died from inhalations of gas, which entered through a conduit leading from the centre of his own car. He came down at Noisy-le-Sec, twenty minutes after his ascent, and died the same day, from gradual sinking. Those of our light hearted countrymen who have been emboldened to dabble themselves in ballooning by the ease with which young Spencer went up to the clouds and came down "in unfractured integrity of limb," had better ponder on that.

A EUROPEAN nobleman, Count Louis Siciliano di Rende, brother of Cardinal Rende, formerly Nuncio at Paris, has died of hydrophobia, but under peculiar circumstances. There had been no bite—no known inoculation of the poison. A month or so before his death, the Count's dog was detected to be suffering. After the summary way of that part of the globe, he at once killed his poor pet. Notwithstanding the prompt precaution he took, retribution overtook him. He was troubled with a vague anxiety and then downright alarm. First he shunned men, then shrank from water. He had lost sleep and lost appetite, and now he could not drink—not even wine which carried associations of the purer liquid. Soon he manifested all the worst signs of hydrophobia, and at last died a cruel death—worse than his dog's.

ON the 11th July, Mr. Bradlaugh asked :—

"I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State is aware that the administration of civil justice in India costs Rs. 2,14,27,000, of which all but the small sum of Rs. 140,000 is obtained by taxation of the litigants, and that Bengal litigants are taxed Rs. 140,000 more than the total cost of civil justice in the province: whether complaints have reached him that the litigants of Bengal who pay more than the whole cost are unable to get their cases tried, and zemindars, whom the Government sell up when they do not pay by sunset the appointed amount, cannot obtain the necessary facilities for the recovery of their rents, and that the munsiffs are terribly overworked, and try cases in ill-ventilated butts, and there is sickness among them in consequence: And, whether the Secretary of State will lay upon the table the correspondence on this subject since 1870 between the High Court of Calcutta and the Government of India upon the requirements of the Bengal judicial service, the Government of Bengal and the Government of India, and the Government of India and the Secretary of State."

The Under-Secretary of State replied :—

"My answer to the first paragraph of the question is that the administration of civil justice in India costs, approximately, Rs. 2,14,27,000, and is defrayed by fees paid by litigants. In Bengal there is a surplus. In Madras the receipts and charges balance each other; and in the rest of India there is a loss. The total deficit exceeds 12½ lakhs. My answer to the second paragraph of the question is in the negative. In regard to the third paragraph, if the hon. member will put himself in communication with me, the Secretary of State will consider whether any papers can be usefully laid upon the table."

BABOO Oodit Narain Singh, styling himself Rajah of Handwah, Bhagalpore, having, through the Commissioner of the Division, "most humbly and respectfully" "offered Rs. 26,000 towards the completion of the water-works at Bhagalpore and Rs. 10,000 towards a Leper Asylum in this town," the Lieutenant-Governor has recorded his "high appreciation of his (the Baboo's) public spirit and liberality." The Baboo may now look forward to Government recognition of his autographic, and possibly also autochthonic, Rajaship.

MR. Smith takes leave for one month and seventeen days from the 1st September, Mr. Westmacott, as on a former occasion, acting as the Presidency Commissioner in addition to his own duties as Commissioner of Excise.

THE retirement of Mr. W. O'Reilly promotes, from the 8th July last, Moulvi Abdul Jubber to the first grade of the Subordinate Executive Service, and enables Government to make several confirmations, and temporary promotions and appointments in the remaining six grades.

THE London Gazette of the 22nd July 1890, notifies the promotion of Surgeon-Major Rajendra Chandra Chandra, of the Bengal Medical Establishment, as Brigade-Surgeon. That appointment, we understood, goes by seniority, where each second stands heir to the first. The distinction, however, comes to the Baboo subsequent to the completion of his regular term of service, and after juniors—Britishers, of course, true blue—have already been promoted over him. It is a parting compliment to a superannuated officer, who stays on the Establishment on sufferance. Still it is some thing to have a Baboo Brigade Surgeon even on such terms.

GOVERNMENT has at last awakened to the necessity of another Judge for the Calcutta Court of Small Causes. No permanent Judge is appointed yet, but Baboo Jadu Nath Roy, who had been off and on acting as the last Judge for the higher Judges on leave, is temporarily Gazetted an Additional Judge, with effect from the 13th instant.

WE are at last in luck's way. The natives are getting a hearing. It is no longer a sign of ton not to know that such things be. This may be seen in the changed conduct of the papers. In the last Indian Planter's Gazette, full two thirds of the Calcutta editorial notes are devoted to describing and criticising the movements of our countrymen. It was not till the writer had written nearly two columns in this behalf that he awoke to what he had been at and was troubled with an uneasy conscience for having gone too far and risked loss of caste for philonativism—we mean no imputation—and proceeded to make his apology. But even after the explanation, he went on at the same rate.

The explanation itself requires explanation; at any rate, the confession with which it concludes may cause heart-burning in certain quarters. It is in these terms :—

"We are all dull and damp, and the arrival of the Maharaja of Cooch Behar amongst us for a few days has not done much to enliven us, in fact I doubt whether many persons are aware that His Highness has arrived."

And has it come to this?

THE Light Brigade Relief Fund wanted £4,000 and they have got it, and more. The cry, however, is for more still, for the applications are more numerous than were at first anticipated.

MANY years ago, Thomas H. Blythe, an Englishman by birth, went to California in quest of fortune and, as one of the pioneers, found it. From time to time, he revisited England, and, in one of these revisits, made the acquaintance of a young woman who bore him a daughter named Florence. Blythe supported and educated her and in various other ways, though not of wedlock born, acknowledged her as his child by word of mouth and in writing. As final recognition, the millionaire willed away his whole fortune, amounting to $4,000,000, to Florence. The will, as a matter of course, was contested. On the testator's death, a whole host of claimants sprung from the ground as it were, all averring lawful propinquity by blood or relationship. Of such were not only Alice Edith Dickerson, the alleged widow of Blythe, and the Williams of Liverpool who called themselves the heirs; but also a family of Gypsies named Blythe; the Savage families in Ireland and Scotland; and Mr. Carlton Blythe of London. The San Francisco Court has, however, awarded the dollars to Florence Blythe, Judge Coffey holding that, although illegitimate, Florence had, according to the State law, been fully and sufficiently accepted as heir.

ERRATA.

OUR leading article of last week on Cardinal Newman was, we regret to see, disfigured by a few errors of the press or slips of the pen. They were not of a kind to prove an impediment to the learned, but as they might possibly puzzle some, we had better notice them. Two of them occur in a single sentence (p. 391, col. 1) in which for Puritan read Puritanism and for Evangelicism read Evangelicalism. In the previous col. for Whitlock read Whitfield. As for the opening Latin we have quoted it aright and are not accountable for anything beyond.

As we are on the subject of Errors, we may as well say that in a previous issue, of 9th instant, in the article "The Fouché of Bengal" the accent was omitted from the name in the heading.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Queen has pardoned the repentant Dhulip, provided he abandons all claim to Lahore or any part of the Punjab. It is a condition that recognizes the right but prohibits its exercise. The whole treatment of the poor prince has been unfair and weak.

THE Anglo-Portuguese Convention has been signed. It concedes all British claims in Nyassaland, extending the British sphere to the westward of Nyassa, and securing to Great Britain a broad belt of country connecting the territory north and south of the Zambesi. It recognizes the immense Portuguese Hinterland in Western Africa and a large extension of Mozambique territory. The navigation of the Zambesi is left free for future settlement. For this satisfactory ending, the British Consul at Mozambique, Mr. Johnston, has been made a Commander of the Bath, and the Acting Consul at Nyassaland, Mr. Buchanan, Companion of the Order of St. Michael and St. George.

THERE is strike among the officers of the mercantile marine at Melbourne. It is assuming graver proportions. The employers at a large meeting have Resolved to support the ship owners. The contagion has spread to Sydney and Brisbane. Many steamers are stopped.

THE Washington Treasury on the 20th purchased 466,000 ounces of silver at an average price of 119½. Large shipments of the metal are being made from New York to Brazil. The Silver party press for another monetary conference of the European Powers.

THERE was an explosion in one of the sheds at the Government Powder Mills at Waltham yesterday morning. Only two deaths are telegraphed.

ON account of cholera, 4,700 pilgrims are in quarantine at El Tor. Forty-eight of them have since died.

A RIOT is reported between Orangemen and Catholics at Stewartstown in Ireland, resulting in the smashing of windows of 30 Catholic houses and the wrecking of a school.

THE Minister of War having cashiered the officers concerned in the late revolution, there were apprehensions of a fresh revolt at Buenos Ayres, and troops were under arms.

THE discontent in the Army Service Corps ending in insubordination at Chatham has been traced to the jealousy existing between the two Companies forming the Corps. The malcontents have been sent away singly and the Sergeant reduced to the rank of Corporal.

GENERAL Gordon, Bengal Staff Corps, succeeds General Lockhart as Assistant Military Secretary at the Horse Guards.

THERE is excessive nay, prohibitive, rise in the price of American wheat and corn. Exports are suspended. So much the better for other producers.

THE Emperor William is now on a visit to the Czar. He landed at Revel on the 17th and proceeded to Narva, where he and the Czar witness several days' manœuvres. General Caprivi keeps his Emperor company.

IT is said the Emperor William visits the Emperor Francis Joseph in September. Speculations are rife as to the object and result of the meeting of the two Emperors.

HOLLAND'S Mill at Manchester has been burned down, causing a loss of £1,20,000.

THERE is a failure of potatoe crop in Ireland. The Irish Secretary, however, does not apprehend a famine.

SIR Edward Bradford has recovered and rejoined his duties. The wonderful English! Their wounded and maimed are more efficient than the whole men in full integrity of other peoples.

AFTER the Parnell Commission, the Government seem to have tired of their affection for the Times. In reply to Sir Wilfrid Lawson's question on the 29th July, whether notwithstanding promise of pardon, a dacoit leader had after an unsatisfactory trial been sentenced to death, Sir John Gorst raised a laugh saying—

"The statements of the Times' correspondent at Rangoon do not generally commend themselves for accuracy to the Secretary of State."

The India Office had telegraphed for information.

THE Guardians and Wards Act, VIII of 1890, has been made applicable to the Civil and Military Station of Bangalore. The Governor-General in Council furthermore allows the courts the liberty to construe the provisions of the Act with such alterations, not affecting the substance, as may be necessary or proper to adapt them to the matter before the courts. This is virtually investing the interpreting courts with legislative functions. Considering how our courts generally go beyond the law and how fantastically they distort simple provisions, such investiture is likely to produce more evil than good.

THE Code of Criminal Procedure is already applicable to the cantonment of Secunderabad since the year of its enactment in 1882. The cantonment is now declared, for the purposes of the Act, to be a province, and the Resident at Hyderabad the Local Government of that province and the highest court of criminal appeal or revision. The noticeable part of the announcement is that the Governor-General in Council is also pleased to direct that all powers which may from time to time have been exercised by the Resident as a Local Government or as the highest court of criminal appeal or revision, shall be deemed to have been exercised according to law. Does the Code give the Governor-General in Council power to legalize past transgressions?

THE Lieutenant-Governor of the North-West Provinces is the only one of the late Viceroy's Lieutenants who is honourably discharging to the full his engagements with respect to the organization for supplying female medical relief to the women of India. They all bowed Lady Dufferin out of the land with profuse promises of unabated fidelity to the cause and zeal in its furtherance, but no sooner was she away than many of them became cold, and just kept up appearances by spasmodic efforts from time to time. Some no doubt have done better, but Sir Auckland Colvin has been the best. He is true as steel. He does not leave a stone unturned to serve the charity. Unfortunately, he is placed at a disadvantage. His jurisdiction is not famous for the wealth of the charitable classes. With scarcely more than one ruling Chief, the N. W. Provinces have not many princely landlords. The new appanage of Oudh just enables the ruler to save the credit of the whole country from the Carnarossa to the borders of the Delhi district and from the frontiers of Tibet to Rajputana and Central India. He has shown a genuine interest in the success of the movement. Wherever he goes on his official rounds, whomsoever he has met, he has always advocated it. He has not only attended meetings of committees and subscribers, but also made time to prepare and deliver long and eloquent addresses. Without abusing his authority, he has done everything to further the cause.

Sir Auckland Colvin lately went to Benares, on the 23rd July. As a consequence, doubtless of that visit, while the Lieutenant-Governor was still in the station, a public meeting was held there. The Maharaja of Benares having been present, was voted to the chair. At this meeting, about Rs. 23,000 was subscribed for the Lady Dufferin Fund, which with His Highness' Rs. 25,000, brings up the amount to Rs. 48,000. This is less than a quarter of the requisition of two lakhs. Raja Sambhu Narain Singh subscribed Rs. 6,000 and offered Rs. 50,000 more provided the hospital was named after his father, Raja Sir Deo Narain Singh: but on this condition it was rejected.

THERE is no pleasing everybody, as poor Mr. Malabari has repeatedly found to his cost. If he "appeals to the country" going round preaching his reform, he is a fussy man. If he asks Government to circulate his views for the opinion of officials and non-officials, he wants to "curry favour" of course. If he goes to England and there quietly addresses himself to those whom he finds disposed to hear and to help, he is simply the naughty fellow we wisemen always took him for, who in keeping with his character is now passing over the reformers and philanthropists who would have none of his hole and corner conferences but insisted upon regular public meetings and "orations." Such, indeed, is now the outcry against the poor man. He is regarded as the Veiled Prophet of Khorasan redivivus among the descendants of the old refugees from Iran.

He hates the light because his deeds are dark!

An inveterate courtier and a man of mystery, he is intriguing in the midst of free England and concocting Cabals for reformation in the East. Meanwhile, he has been labouring in the way that seemed to him best. He has already made some distinct progress. His English Committee have formulated the following programme of reforms which he and his friends think ripe for being taken up in right earnest, namely:—

(1) To amend the Indian Penal Code, by repealing the exception to Section 375, and thus making 12, instead of 10, the age of consent.

(2) To amend the Code of Civil Procedure, by enacting that a suit shall not lie for the restitution of conjugal rights or for the recovery of a wife.

(3) To amend the Marriage Law, by enacting that persons married during infancy shall have the opportunity, when they come to years of discretion, of themselves ratifying the contract. It might be enacted that where a girl is married under 12, the marriage may, at any time before consummation, and after she attains the age of 12 (or 14) be made void by a formal declaration on her part before a magistrate. This declaration should be capable of being made whether the husband is alive or dead at the time, so that the infant widow might, if so disposed, emancipate herself from the status of widowhood.

(4) To pass a law, enabling parents in India to defer the marriage of their children to any age they like, and recognizing as a public offence or contempt of Court any overt act on the part of neighbours or castemen against such parents.

(5) To amend the Re-Marriage Act of 1856 as to the civil and property rights of a widow who re-marries, as the Government of India offered to do in 1886; to enable her at least to enjoy such rights as her husband has conferred on her by will.

(6) To make the Re-Marriage ceremony simple and inexpensive, say by two or three declarations before the Registrar, or to extend the benefit of the Brahmo Marriage Act to such Hindus as are unable or unwilling to avail themselves of the marriage ceremonies provided by their own law.

(7) To take more active steps than hitherto for making known to the people Sections 372 and 373 of the Indian Penal Code as to the procuring and disposing of minors as temple devotees and dancing girls, and for rigorously enforcing these sections.

(8) To help voluntary associations working for social reform on the principle of self-help, by conferring on them such powers and privileges as may enable them to carry out their programme, by lending them sympathy and moral support, and generally by recognizing honest efforts on the part of individual reformers.

(9) To afford special facilities and inducements to girls to remain at school after 10; and to widows to study medicine, sanitation, the art of teaching, and so on, providing them with suitable employment so far as is possible."

That is a considerable beginning, no matter if some parts of the programme be found impracticable, indeed all the better for the spice of impracticability. Impracticability is a zest of life—an element of its romance. It is the very fuel for the Reform boiler.

At Trichinopoly, a poor widow of the labouring class gave birth to a daughter, nursed it for several months and, unable to do so any longer, sold it to a dancing girl. The transfer was made by a regular deed of conveyance, duly signed, sealed and delivered. It was last taken to the Sub-Registrar of Warriur who completed the deed by his seal and signature. Is this Sub who registers deeds of darkness without compunction openly in a British Province, a retired old Kazi?

THE poor plucked of the last intermediate examination of the Allahabad University have pukrowed the Vice-Chancellor to take pity on their "pitiable" condition. In their petition ad misericordiam they present a harrowing picture. Their plea for mercy they offer in explanation of their failure is the—Influenza. They pose as martyrs, claiming for themselves a "rare and heroic devotion to duty"—victims of a fortuitous combination of circumstances.

"Not only did they suffer in body and mind, but many lost their near and dear relatives. There are some who managed somehow to attend with medicine phials in their pockets, but not being able to stand the strain to the last, they broke down."

Unfortunately, the Pioneer, so fruitful of resources when its own clientele is concerned, has nothing better to offer these petitioners than the advice—for which, by the way, no ghost of a leading journal was required—not to waste their time in drawing up petitions, but to get rid of their colds, if they have not done so already, and read for the next examination.

ACCORDING to the Deccan Herald, the Cantonment Magistrate of Poona, after investigating a charge of theft—of some socks from a laundry—against a child of not more than five years of age, found it guilty and sentenced it to a whipping of as many stripes as its age. Then the heart of the punctilious Avatar of Justice failed him. He saw the danger of executing the sentence. Five strokes might be capital punishment for the tender thing at the bar. He would not, could not, be hard on the child, and he took care that his order was carried out with a light rattan. This Indian Magistrate has well deserved a course of whipping himself—and not with a light cane but a regular cat—for his ignorance of the initial direction of the Indian Penal Code. For, nothing is an offence which is done by a child under seven years of age. Harsh and mischievous as is the Code, it is better than many of those charged with the execution of its numerous provisions. It is certainly not the madness that the trial in question assumed it to be. We wonder what creed this Cantonment Magistrate professes. He may be a Christian after a sort. He certainly never felt the force of Jesus' admonition and avowal, Suffer little children to come unto me, for of such is the Kingdom of Heaven! After all, neither law nor Scripture is needed to teach the obvious truth that children, more truly than kings, can do no wrong.

THE Municipal Commissioners are divided as to who should now represent them in the Port Trust. There were several applicants—mostly undesirable. The Commissioners went to vote last week. Many of the candidates were eliminated, and the result was a tie between a Mahomedan translator and a Hindu merchant, himself a millionaire into the bargain. The tie was not unloosened and the matter stands over for next Thursday. We can only remark that he who touts most for votes is not necessarily the best person to be returned, and hope the Commissioners will have the good sense to prevent a scandal. Cannot Sir Henry Harrison come to the rescue? The gentlemen on the riverside ought to be saved.

As the friends of our townsman Kassim Ariff Saheb must be very anxious about his welfare, we are glad to say, that a telegram has been received from Bombay from which we gather that he and his family are all safe. The reports about the breaking out of cholera on board the S. S. Deccan and at Camran appear to have been exaggerated. No intimation has, however, been yet received in Calcutta of the arrival of the Deccan at Jeddah. The latest information is that as the Huff was over, and the pilgrims on board the Deccan were not allowed to get out of quarantine at Camran owing to illness, the Deccan has been permitted to proceed to Jeddah, without the pilgrims, for the purpose of landing her cargo, after which she will return to Camran, take up the pilgrim passengers, and bring them back to Bombay.

THANA Gya has been divided into Gya Town and Gya Mofussil thanas. Why not Suburban instead of Mofussil? When will these hideous words cease to disfigure our official papers? It was time enough for the British in India to be thoroughly English in their speech and writing.

A VEGETABLE chameleon—a kaleidoscope of the botanical kingdom—is announced. It is said that a flower has been found in the Isthmus of Tehuantepec which changes colours during the day. In the morning it is white; at noon, red; and at night, blue. The tree is about the size of a guava tree, and emits a perfume only when the sun is at its zenith. The romance of both hemispheres is centred in—the richest possibilities of the globe are credited to—that land. The habitat is appropriate. The waves of the Eastern and Western main lave its shores and dance deliriously in delight as though they would meet and mingle their waters in mutual embrace, over its head. All the poetry is in jeopardy and all the physical characteristics and of course their peculiar fruit, from the intrusion of the scientific Vandals in the service of insatiable Commerce.

THE young Maharaja of Morbhanj is in Calcutta in charge of Mr. Kiddell and is the guest of the Maharani of Cooch Behar at Woodlands, where he stays during his whole sojourn. We hope this does not mean a revival of the match which had been in contemplation.

THE Indian Daily News, under the head of "A Departed Worthy," published on the 15th, the following letter:—

"Sir,—To-day I am again present before your readers to relate the sad death of Rai Deno Nath Ghose, Bahadoor, who was one of the great politicians of India. He was getting pension from the Government, but his head was so sharp even at this age that the chief politicians asked his advice to do their work. From a long time he was suffering from diabetes, but his disease increased from the death of his eldest son, the late Baboo Charoo Chunder Ghose, who died by taking a quantity of opium a few months ago. About a week or two ago the late Rai Deno Nath Ghose, Bahadoor, was attacked with carbuncle, which ended his life yesterday morning. But it is a matter of deep regret that when he was at the point of death, when his throat snarled, no one was there, so he was unable to see any one at the time of his death. Death cares for none: the great and the low, the honored and the simple, the rich and the poor, and the virtuous and the vicious are the same in his eyes. None can avoid his horrible grasp. A crowd of reputed persons was in the habit of visiting the deceased gentleman, among whom were Sir Maharajah Jotindro Mohun Tagore, Bahadoor, K.C.S.I., Rajah Doorga Churn Law, C.I.E., Mahamahopadhyaya Mahesh Chunder Nyayaratna, and others. The late Rai Deno Nath Ghose, Bahadoor, lived at Shambazar for a long time: he was gentle, submissive, and a virtuous person. He was the patron of the poor and the needy. As regards me I knew him well as I am his neighbour, and I can verily say that I have never found fault with him. Now, I think that the public will sympathise with his loss, and pray to God that his descendants may live in peace.—Yours, &c.,

AMULLYA CHURN NUNDY,
Secretary to the Shambazar Albert
Library, and a Member of the Georgian Association, Bible Society."

A FAIR flower of the Bengal Civil Service has just been nipped in the bud. We record with pain the death of Mr. M. E. Bradford. The circumstances of his last days make the event specially distressing—to our Oriental mind at any rate. A member of the ruling class, and a gentleman of connections, as of personal popularity, such are the strange conditions of life in the European camp, rather than community or society, in India, that directly he was prostrated by sickness than he had to betake to the pauper's refuge in a public charity. We think his removal from Rampore Haut, where he was in charge of the sub-division, was a great mistake. Without any pretensions to be a medical expert, one can see the risk of sending a patient suffering from malarial poison from a dry salubrious district like Beerbhoom to the hospital atmosphere of a damp city on the skirts of the Sunderbuns and right on the Salt Water Lake—now the repository of all the refuse and dirt of a great population. Here, in the wilderness of the metropolis, the young man was deposited in the General Hospital, far from home and country, away from kinsmen or relations or friends, nursed by mere mercenaries. It was well that before death closed the scene, he had for days been unconscious.

What can atone (oh, ever-injur'd shade!)

Thy fate unpitied, and thy rites unpaid?

No friend's complaint, no kind domestic tear

Pleas'd thy pale ghost or grac'd thy mournful bier:

By foreign hands thy dying eyes were closed,

By foreign hands thy decent limbs composed,

By foreign hands thy humble grave adorned,

By strangers honoured, and by strangers mourned!

Mr. Bradford was one of the best specimens of British young manhood. Passionately fond of hunting and sports, he was no gross John Bull, but a man of education and feeling. He was in fact a thorough gentleman in the best sense and no mere man of the world. He conquered wherever he went. He was beloved of all classes, Europeans and natives. He was one of our most promising officers in the Bengal Service, having already given unquestionable proofs of ability—not simply of intellectual grasp but also of executive tact and energy—and withal he knew how to approach the hearts of those he had to deal with. The death of such a public servant is a loss to the state. He was so different from the typical Young Official, flippant, insolent and even rowdy, without the slightest consideration for native claims, that we cannot help mourning for him.

This death ought to be a warning against the reckless shikaring into which even unseasoned Europeans are too prone to plunge in the East. Son of General Bradford, then of the India Office now at the head of the London Police, who came in charge of our last royal visitor, young Mr. Bradford was invited to join the Prince's party, and bore His Royal Highness company in all his hunts, thus with the Prince himself catching the poison of the jungle. The Prince has luckily escaped—poor Bradford succumbed.

To the good father of the deceased we offer our most respectful sympathies. His is a most trying bereavement. The death of a grown up son in the flower of life is always a cruel calamity. And he has lost such a son!

WE have received a communication touching a statement in our article on University Scandals on the second instant, namely, that the inquiry arose on the complaint of a candidate who stood third in the B. L. Examination this year. The young gentleman contradicts that statement, denying any share in the matter.

HINDUS AND MAHOMEDANS.

THE BEERBHOOM BARBARITY.

THERE are no signs of a growing rapprochement between Hindus and Mahomedans. On the contrary, the appearances are all the other way. The deadliest feelings of animosity between the followers of the rival religions prevail as strongly as ever, nay, more than ever, and the slightest incident is enough to kindle them into a flame. English education and enlightenment and British influence in general seem to have done far too little in bridging the gulf between the two races. Truth to say, they have acted in an opposite direction. After all, that education and that influence have so far influenced but the merest fringe of the population, and the masses at large remain as little humanised by its effects as before. And such as they are, they are disturbing forces in society as in the household, making for war rather than peace. In regard to this as to other Indian social phenomena, the widest divergencies are observable. There are small coteries of enlightened Mahomedans and Hindus who, whatever their private peculiarities, are undistinguishable in their public conduct as brothers from brothers. While, as regards the people in general, the case is quite the contrary. The bitterest personal antipathies are entertained towards each other and expressed in outward demeanour. Not even the ordinary demands of personal and public courtesy are regarded, and it is impossible for Mahomedans and Hindus to come together without some overt or covert expressions of feeling of an unpleasant kind.

We talk of an Indian nationality evolved by English influences. No doubt, on the face of things, and in some measure, such a consummation is fostered by those influences. English education with the Press, the Railway, the Telegraph, and, above all, a common Government and Law seem all essaying towards this end, and the Indian Congress does no small service in affording by its annual assemblages a visible evidence of the growing progress. But what a rude shock is given to all such peaceful dreams by the periodical explosions of religious antipathy between rival communities which threaten to defy all gentler influences. In spite of the best efforts of Government officers, and presumably of the better sort of people, these explosions have already acquired a chronic character, and one almost despairs of seeing an end put to them. The following facts of a case, in which a number of Mahomedans of the Beerbhoom district were convicted and sentenced to imprisonment, are extraordinary in all conscience. We take the report from the proceedings before the High Court which would not grant a rule to shew cause why the conviction and sentence should not be set aside:—

"The following extraordinary case came up, it being a conviction of five Mahomedans by the Joint-Magistrate of Burhum for the offence of wounding the religious susceptibilities of some Hindu fellow-villagers. The grounds of appeal were that the facts as disclosed in the evidence constituted no offence; that there was no intention of wounding the religious feelings of any one; and that the whole affair was carried out for the purpose of exorcising an evil spirit from the neighbourhood. The facts were these: There was a village goddess, or rather her symbol, consisting of a piece of stone placed beneath a mohwa tree at the edge of a tank outside the inhabited area of the village of Kakotola. The tree and stone were undoubtedly objects held sacred by the Hindus, and so were the tank and a banian tree which stood on the opposite side of it. The annual worship of the goddess was carried on, and puja was also offered to her. Near this place of the goddess were some waste lands, a sort of superstitious awe deterring people from cultivating them. One Hindu, however, took up some of this land, but he and his children died shortly after, the villagers attributing the misfortune to the anger of the goddess. A Mahomedan then took it up and cultivated it, but soon gave it up, asserting that an apparition with matted hair had been often seen in his house. In November last the accused took up the lands, but dreaded the anger of the goddess, whom they looked upon as an evil spirit. On the 20th of June last, at midday, a Hindu cowherd observed the accused and a number of other Mahomedans coming from the direction of their village with a cow led by a rope. The animal was taken round the tank, and then to the waste land, where it was slaughtered. The flesh of the cow was taken to the shrine of the goddess; the stone was smeared with its blood, and some flesh put on it. Some of the bones were stuck up in the hollows of the tree, and a leg was also hung on a branch. Preparations were then made for a feast. The beef was cooked under the banian tree and eaten, and the feast lasted till evening. A Hindu villager witnessed all these doings, but being Hindu he averted his face when the cow was being slaughtered and skinned; but a Mahomedan witness saw the whole affair. He deposed that blood was smeared on the stone by one of the accused, with the remark that the goddess did not get oil and vermillion, and that the blood would supply the want. Another one of the accused made the remark, when enquiries were being made about the occurrence, 'We have put blood on the stone; now let us test your goddess; let her break my neck.' The accused all denied the facts, and alleged that the case had been concocted from beginning to end. The Magistrate, however, found that it had been fully proved that the sacred stone of the Hindus had been defiled with beef and blood at the hands of the accused (who all of them thus became members of an unlawful assembly) with the criminal object of defiling it. The Magistrate also found that in this case the offence was not the outcome of any religious antipathy or intolerance, but the result of mere superstition. The intention was not so much to outrage the religious feelings of the Hindus, as to drive a malicious spirit away from the place. The accused were sentenced to terms of imprisonment, varying from two months to five weeks.

On the above facts their Lordships (Messrs. Justices Prinsep and Hill) refused to interfere, remarking that the accused very well deserved what they had got, as they must have known that what they were doing was an outrage on the religious susceptibilities of the Hindus."

The incidents of the case are of an extremely outrageous character and point to the existence of a religious intolerance deep in the hearts of its perpetrators. But these were presumably illiterate men, and this may afford some consolation. In a recent case of a more grievous kind, even this element of comfort is not to be found. We refer to the Durbhunga cow-killing riot.

The actors there are all men of wealth and position, and the guilt is represented to lie at the door of the Hindus rather than the Mahomedans. And all the worse for them if it is a sequel of the Durbhunga Temple case. In any case, they must have been intolerably provoked. Perhaps they had been culpably neglected, too, by those whose business it was to do justice between class and class and maintain the general peace.

THE HINDUS AND THE MAHOMEDANS.

THE SEQUEL OF THE DURBHUNGA TEMPLE CASE.

THE Mahomedan Eed uz Zuha, popularly known as the Festival of Buckreed, fell this year on the 28th July. On that occasion, it is customary for the Mahomedans to sacrifice an animal—it may be a buckra—a goat or lamb—or it may be a camel, if the party can afford the waste. It may even be the sacred animal of the Hindus, to whom the very thought of such a proceeding is most revolting—who cannot hear of such a fate for the object of their veneration without sin. As the Mahomedans after sacrifice distribute the meat for eating, the killing of a goat is a poor business—a family affair—which cannot call forth the enthusiasm of the neighbourhood. The camel is the Bedouin's fare; it may be a delicacy to the Arab, but the Indian stomach cannot stand it. Hence the camel sacrifice in this country involves a needless waste and invites a diarrhoea among the faithful: Hence the genuine preference for the remaining alternative, besides the factitious pleasure of eating the Hindus's god—a preference shown by Mahomedans, specially of the lower classes, whenever they can venture on the outrage on their fellow-subjects of the other sect. As a rule, the Hindus are not molested in their religious susceptibilities. The chief reason is that Hindus and Mussulmans get on well and regard, or at least regarded till lately, themselves together as forming one society. Such was the spirit of mutual forbearance that respectable Mussulmans have mostly forgotten their taste of beef. The Moslem populace though prizing it as the only meat practically open, from its cheapness, to the poor, are restricted to the butcher's shop for their supply. In general, they dare not outrage the sect of the majority—the sect of wealth and learning—by slaughtering the animal in their midst—a proceeding which, in their belief, would not only pollute the whole place but also volens volens, notwithstanding their nonparticipation, compromise them in their after-life.

It is only when ill blood prevails between the sects that this slaughter is resorted to, as the surest way of insulting and punishing the Hindus. Even so it was in the present instance.

Ever since a Hindu temple—an object of general Hindu veneration—at Durbhunga was demolished by the late Vice-Chairman of the municipality, a Mahomedan, with a lot of Mahomedan servants and workmen, under magisterial orders, the entente cordiale has been broken. The special official inquiry, instead of allaying the irritation, aggravated it to the highest pitch. In this state of feeling, one Hossaini, whose position may be inferred from his name, gave out his intention to sacrifice the sacred animal on the Buck-reed. The news flew like wild fire and threw the whole Hindudom into violent agitation. When on the evening of the 28th July it was ascertained that an animal was in readiness at Hossaini's house for the purpose, fury suddenly seized the Hindus and they rose en masse to save their god and their souls. The quarter was besieged by hundreds and thousands of yelling men, many armed with sticks and brickbats. The terrified Mahomedans hastened to the Magistrate at his residence and brought him to the scene. He could with difficulty restore quiet. We will now let the District Magistrate, Mr. C. J. S. Faulder, c. s., tell the story as he gave it on oath before the Special Magistrate appointed to investigate:—

"On Monday last, the 28th ultimo, at nearly 10-45 P.M., some Mahomedans came to my house, and told me they wanted to kill a cow, and the Hindus were preventing them. I told them to go to the thannah. Half an hour or so later, some Hindus came to me at my house, and objected to this being done in their mahulla (quarter) in the street. I said I would go, and I ordered my carriage. Dhanookdhari (whom I point out) came to tell me. I drove to Kutkibazar, which runs in front of Baboo Brij Behari Lall's (the present Municipal Vice-Chairman) house. When I got there, I found the whole neighbourhood crowded out, and people shouting and gesticulating in a very excited manner. A lot of Hindus came round me, and gesticulated and shouted and pointed to a lane leading to the west. Their manner was turbulent and excited. The Mahomedans came to me and asked me to help against the opposition of the Hindus, and several Mahomedans were brought to me, and I saw their heads and faces cut, bruised and bleeding. I then went down the gullee (lane). I found crowds of Hindus shouting in a defiant and threatening manner towards what proved to be the house of the complainant (Hossaini). I thought their attitude so provoking as to cause a breach of the peace. I caused two or three to be arrested. As I was going along, I saw Hindus brandishing latees and hurling stones in defiance towards Hossaini's (the complainant) house. I arrested one man, as he was actually brandishing his latee towards the house from behind. I think I can identify him. When I got close to Hossaini's house, I saw Dhanookdhari Misser, who was taking a prominent part in gesticulating at the house in a manner likely to cause a breach of the peace. I took him under arrest. I saw that if the sacrifice took place, there would be a serious riot; so I told the Mahomedans they must give it up. They said they would do whatever I told them. I saw very few police present. I thought it better to go away and bring up more. I returned down the gullee (lane) to the main street. I still saw bands of men brandishing latees defiantly, and bricks being thrown about. When I got to the main road, the Hindus crowded round me in a threatening and insolent way. From time to time I seized men who were most obtrusive, and amongst others I arrested him (pointed out Nundkishore Lall), who was making himself particularly obnoxious and shouting in a menacing way. I then drove to the thannah. When I got there, I found the police had gone to the place of occurrence by the direct road. I had gone round to avoid the crowd. I drove back to the place of occurrence by the direct road, about half a mile only from the thannah. When I came back to the gullee, I found a large force of police and a number of chowkidars had taken possession of the gullee. On the main road I still saw crowds of Hindus shouting and gesticulating, and as I came, I saw a number of men with latees run away through Brij Behari Lall's (the Municipal Vice-Chairman) premises, throwing back bricks as they went. My attention was directed to a lane which runs west of this Baboo's house, and I went round and I saw a band of men with latees running down the lane, and before they got out of sight, they turned and threw several bricks back at me. I then returned to the main road and gullee. There was not much going on on account of the chowkidars. The crowd followed me down the gullee, still behaving in the same obtrusive and menacing manner. When I got to Hossaini's (the complainant) house, I thought it best to remove the cause of disturbance. I arranged for the cow to be sent to my house. I then returned to the street. The Hindus were all the time crowding round me and shouting in a loud, defiant, angry manner. On my way back down the gullee to the street—I do not remember whether it was the first time or the second—one man, a Hindoo, whom I think I can identify, made himself particularly obnoxious, walking backwards before me the whole way, and half settling down at every step and stopping me, and said (as far as I could understand) that he would cut his throat if the cow was not released: he kept on putting his hand across his throat. At last I had him arrested. Whilst I was going down the gullee, I don't remember which time, the first or second, another man whom I can identify, a Hindoo, ran at a Mahomedan who was asking for help, and knocked him down at my feet. I had him arrested. I returned to the street, and went away. At both visits I arrested those men whom I saw to be most obtrusive—altogether ten or twelve persons. During the whole time, Mahomedans were brought up to me from time to time covered with blood. Out of the accused I pick out and identify—(1) Nandkishore, (2) Dhanookdhari, (3) Muni Teli: this man, I think, was saying he would cut his throat: (4) Gyanchand—I remember arresting him. Afterwards out of the eight or twelve persons whom I arrested, I found the police had let off all but three. I should think there were at least 2,000 persons in the crowd. I recognise a Marwari (pointed him out), but I don't know if I recognise seeing him in the riot, or elsewhere. I did not see the Mahomedans do any acts of violence. I saw no latees in their hands, and their attitude was one of protest. They were in a large minority."

So far as we can judge from this distance, and without special information, Mr. Faulder is responsible for allowing matters to come to a head. But the root of all we suspect was in the Bengal office.

MR. MALABARI'S GUJRAT AND THE GUJRATIS.*

THIS is no new work, but a wellknown and well appreciated performance, and it is sufficient for us to announce its present appearance. We cordially congratulate the author on his success: it is indeed matter for national gratulation that a thoroughly native production should be so successful. No literary work in English by a native of India has acquired half the measure of popularity of Gujrat and the Gujratis. Certainly, none has attained to the dignity of a third edition. It is now a standard work—if a small collection of unpretentious sketches, however clever, of persons and things in an Indian Province, may be allowed such a proud name. The author himself gives the following modest account of the Natural History of his book—of its evolution from the original germ into substantial separate being, and of its several incarnations into the present personality:—

"STRUGGLES OF A CHEAP NEWSPAPER."

It was a cheap weekly, hitherto owned by two partners, consins, one who had given it money, the other brains. Two more partners were added, my friend N. bringing money, and I supposed as supplying brains. The work was fairly divided—the first proprietor, D., a small clerk, undertook business management. N. was to help D., and also to make himself useful to us—my friend P. and myself—in the literary business. For a week or two all went on smoothly; but we soon felt the necessity of discussing our position. N. was a man of temper, and among other things 'composers' did not take kindly to him. I received frequent complaints as to his harshness; but knowing he had brought us the sinews of war I could do nothing more than appeal to his good sense. On Saturday night Mr. N. was given a 'proof' to read. He corrected it; but instead of entering corrections on the margins, poked his pen into the body of the 'composed matter.' The compositor, of course, could not follow such corrections, and the paper was delayed next morning. On Sunday, when we four proprietors met, I gently asked Mr. N. to be good enough to enter corrections, in future, on the margins of the proof sheet. N. glared at me for what he took to be an insult, and replied that he had paid 1,000 rupees to be his own master—that he would do just what he liked, and would not be bullied by people who had not contributed a pie. This sneer was passed over by me; but the co-editor winced under it, and replied hotly to N.'s insinuation. What threatened to be a bad quarrel was, however, soon made up; and we all adjourned to an adjoining hotel to discuss the future of the paper and a substantial breakfast provided for the occasion, I forget by whom.

EDITORIAL VAGARIES.

But by-and-bye we two editors could not quite agree between ourselves. I was for treatment of social questions chiefly; my friend P. affected politics. We settled this difference by confining each to his own forte. Our ignorance, even in this, was as boundless as was our arrogance. But was it not glorious to criticise and ridicule the highest men in the country? What a privilege for too-early-emancipated school-boys! Nothing could be easier than my share of the literary work: I turned into prose, every week, two of my versified social essays, of which I had a large supply at home. Did poet ever sacrifice his substance as I did, in those days, in the public interests? My sweet sonorous hexameters surrendered bodily to the manipulations of the dirty P. D. I No martyr could do more. My friend P. wrote political essays. He was decidedly better-read than I. Certainly he took pains with his essays; but how could a young man of less than twenty overtake topics which baffle the grasp of practised veterans? One day, writing, I believe, of the battle of Plevna, P. asked me what was meant by 'the Porte.' I explained 'the Porte' might be the Sultan of Turkey's principal wife. P. thought it was only the European title of the Khedive of Egypt. We often thought and wrote in that curious way.

* Gujrat and the Gujratis: Pictures of Men and Manners taken from Life. Third Edition. By Behramji M. Malabari. Bombay. Printed at the Fort Printing Press, 1889.

EDITORIAL AMENITIES.

This could not last; and one evening P. suggested, in council, that our capitalist partners should get a few reference-books for the editor's table. Mr. N. refused to pay for our 'extravagance.' I submitted, as chairman, that we were neither of us extravagant, and that Mr. N. was wrong. Hereupon he brought definite charges against us. P. replied to the accusations and N. retorted, winding up rather suddenly with a demand for his money. P. was dum-founded, but he soon found courage to ask N. if he meant really to be so 'perfidious.' N. replied, with equal ferocity, 'Return my money this minute.' 'Very well,' coolly said P., taking up N.'s new turban and throwing it out of the window, desiring its owner to leave instantly, on pain of being sent after the turban by the same means of exit. But N. did nothing of the sort. He took P. by the throat, and demanded the satisfaction of throwing out his turban. 'It is my right, give me my right,' he shrieked, 'and then I'll leave.' Here they closed. They tugged and lodged, tore each other's hair and clothes, and mauled each other very prettily. It was with the utmost difficulty that the young Tartars could be separated. And the two—once intimate friends and college chums—have never since been on speaking terms. That evening, in the presence of servants and neighbours, who had come up on hearing of the fracas, the chairman shed tears of anguish, in his editorial and presidential chair, at all his hopes of fame and fortune having vanished so suddenly. One could put up with light inconvenience, such as of working as compositor, reader, printer, distributor, manager, editor and so forth, all offices rolled into one. But this exposure—oh it was too too cruel!

But crushing as the disappointment was, it enabled me to cast about for some equally powerful distraction. I had long cherished the hope of visiting Gujarāt and Kātywār with some definite business views, and having, at this juncture, received an offer from a friend, I accepted it thankfully.

A POOR PROGRAMME.

This personal explanation has been given, reader, to warn you against expecting too much from my book. Now that you know me, I know you will not be too exacting. If you are curious to revel in the luxury of deep and learned research, I must frankly refer you to Oriental Memoirs; to Forbes, Briggs, Ferishta, and such others, with whom my acquaintance is slightest of slight, barely sufficient to make me know my place. If you want to refresh, and at the same time to enlighten your mind, you had better turn to the picturesque details of the gifted padre Heber. Should you wish to have correct statistics and authenticated accounts of this Presidency, I could safely recommend you to pore over Mr. J. M. Campbell's Bombay Gazetteers. In these prodigious results of editorial labour you will find a forest of facts and figures which you can traverse leisurely, till you become another Dr. Hunter, a prince of particulars, a very king of quotations. But if you care to have a fresh account of, perhaps, the least known but most interesting parts of Her Majesty's Indian Empire, of the inner life of an important people, their habits, customs, manners, the moral and social forces at work among them, then you are welcome to those pages, such as they are. You will have to be content with rough, hasty sketches, but generally taken on the spot—sketches from real life. I could not promise you much of system and order—because, you see, this is not an Official Report. A number of these sketches appeared, at the time, in the Bombay Review, and are all the better for having received a few touches here and there from the accomplished editor. Not a few of them were, indeed, undertaken at the suggestion of that veteran journalist. These sketches, and a few more contributed to other papers, are here put into shape, intermixed with extracts from letters to friends and the contents of a rough diary—all strung together on a rather slender narrative thread.

I do not mind confessing, reader, that this is a poor sort of programme. But it is, perhaps, as well it is so. I may also prepare you for a little exaggerated expression, wherever the writer is 'intense.' But you will not find cause to question my bona fides. In spite of occasional levity, degenerating at times almost into what may appear to be flippancy, I do assure you that no writer meant to be more serious. If you follow my sketchings in the spirit and the letter, if you read between the lines, you will not find them all mere caricatures.

The first edition of the Gujarāt and the Gujarātis was brought out under serious disadvantages. The MS. had to be sent off to London unrevised, and revision of proofs was out of the question. An attempt has been made in the present volume to correct misprints, supply omissions, and to check the tendency of some of the observations to appear too sweeping. The glare of paint which disfigured one or two of the 'pictures' has made room for sober tints. But though the form has been in some instances modified, the matter is substantially the same. For what defects still remain the critic would do well not to condemn the workman for the rawness of his materials.

Five new chapters have been added to this volume to suit different tastes. These chapters could be easily elaborated for a larger volume. The rough illustrations might serve as 'aid' to readers who have never been to India. These are the best that could be obtained on the spot, not, however, without many trials by friends in the profession. The experiments so far did not justify a more serious effort."

The latter part of the last paragraph, we confess, puzzles us. Partly from the poverty of the English language and partly from the custom of figurative employment of it, the word illustration, like others of the Pictorial Art, has become equivocal, and acquired more than one sense, being now used for writing and now for drawing—at one time for letter-press description and at another for visible representation—picture in fact. Remembering the second title of the book—Pictures of Men and Manners taken from Life—we naturally took our author's "rough illustrations" for pennings instead of pencillings. And there is nothing in the context—at least in the first sentence—hostile to that sense. But the next sentence arrested us, specially the mention of "friends in the profession," which evidently refers to the artistic profession, until we settle in the end in absolute gloom and confusion. Had there been any visible signs in the direction, the matter were different; it were all right. But where are the illustrations, "rough" or elaborate? There is not a sketch or drawing of any kind, good, bad or indifferent—not a scrap or scrawl. Has Mr. Malabari too imbibed the lesson of shabby-pious Hinduism, which knows how to convert a burden into an instrument of highest advantage, as by making of their blind old cow a present to the Brahman? Are the illustrated copies reserved for our betters—the genuine critics and truly elegant and eloquent writers on the press? There is no promise of pictorial scenes in the programme of the title-page, nor a list of illustrations in the table of contents, in our copy. But that fact may be explained by opposite hypotheses. At any rate, it were cruel to think the spirit of high refinement and chivalrous honour, of liberality and benevolence which characterise its pages, capable of stooping to such pettiness. There were certainly a few "illustrations" in the previous edition, quite answering to the character given them by the author himself. Suspecting a derangement of epitaphs, we refer to the former issue and find ourselves confirmed.

Mr. Malabari is one of our best English writers, and this book, though a comparatively juvenile performance, is worthy of his reputation. His command of English has amazed those who speak and write that language as their mother-tongue. But Mr. Malabari is something more than a maker of choice sentences. He is a man of genius. The book abounds in the finest humour and teems with strokes of the most delicate wit. That story of native journalism extracted above is not unworthy of Grenville Murray or Edmund About. It is a most interesting and even valuable work, which no native of India should be without. To those foreigners who desire to know what our native Indian life is like, to which they can have no access, and which they cannot possibly understand without intelligent Indian help, it is simply invaluable.

MONGHYR.

Jamalore, 15th August 1890.

Monghyr was full of pomp and bustle for the last two days, the 12th and 13th owing to the advent of the Lieutenant-Governor. There were fireworks, illuminations (even the river was ablaze with lighted chirags floating down the current). A grand dinner and a ball concluded the festivities on the occasion.

Ramprosad's ghat where his Honor's yacht anchored was beautifully decorated, having triangular and quadrangular temporary arches with lamps on. The sumptuous dinner was given by the Rajah of Gidhore in a splendid style. There was a sprinkling of spectators from all sides, comprising of Rajahs, Reises, Europeans Bengalis and Beharis.

A detachment of the Jamalore Volunteer corps was not wanting to shew their loyalty. They in a body accompanied by a Band went to Monghyr to form a guard of honor. I understand Sir Stuart Bayley and suite were out driving in and out of the town. They paid a visit to the Hot Spring (the famous Seeta-coond) and the well known Poerabaree house owned by the late Prosono Coomar Tagore, the Zillah school and Dear's Hospital.

The tide of reduction on the E. I. Railway is sweeping away some of the eminent executive European officers of the Co. Rumour has it, that the Government 55 years' rule will be enforced on the employés of the Co. irrespective of color and creed. Of course it is an admitted fact that a rule is a rule, but the question is, what is to be left for those unfortunates who will come under the operation of the same rule, beyond a small pittance in the Provident Fund, after having spent the better portion of their lives in serving the Co. with assiduity and zeal right through? In the Government service, pension is allowable, whereas in the Railway and other private services no provision is made for the employés to fall back upon in their old age.

The native residents of this station are really sorry to part with Dr. Kadar Nath Mitter, L. M. S., who, I understand, has already received his Departmental orders for a transfer as medical officer in charge of the Ghaziabad District with an increase of pay. During the period of his service at this station, he proved an efficient physician and surgeon as well and won the good opinion of the people. The climate of the place now may be said to be pretty fair.

SIR RICHARD GARTH ON THE REFORM OF LEGISLATIVE COUNCILS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE Reis and Rayvet.

SIR—In his recent communication to India, Sir Richard Garth distinctly declares that he has been an openly professed friend of the Congress movement and that he is not aware of any other constitutional means which the educated portion of the Indian people "could have adopted for the purpose of bringing the grievances under which they had so long laboured, to the notice of the British public." The late learned Chief Justice of Bengal also bears personal testimony to the thoroughly loyal spirit of the movement. Congressionists are deeply grateful to him for this valuable certificate of character given to them and for his avowed friendship to their cause. It is, however, to be deeply regretted that in his examination of the Congress scheme for the improvement of the Provincial and Viceregal Councils, which forms the basis of Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill, he should have ignored altogether one of the principal safeguards for the representation of minorities which are among the central features of the Madras scheme that received the approval of the Fifth National Congress. It provides double safeguards for the representation of minorities, firstly, on the electoral colleges and secondly, on the legislative councils. The scheme insists on the representation of minorities by means of a statutory provision fixing the exact proportion of the members of the European, Eurasian, Mahomedan, and Parsee and other communities so as to ensure at least a minimum representation of their interests on the electoral colleges. Sir Richard Garth has, I am glad to say, very properly noticed this safeguard. But it is impossible to agree with him where he observes "Thus the Councils will be filled with Hindu members to the exclusion of all the other great sections and interests in the community." I have very carefully gone through Sir R. Garth's communication but I fail to see how he arrived at this conclusion with the resolution of the last Congress before him in connection with the representation of minorities on the Councils. Its fifth clause declares in the most unequivocal terms that "when Parsees, Christians, Mahomedans or Hindus are in a minority, the total number of Parsees, Christians, Hindus, or Mahomedans, as the case may be, elected to the provincial legislatures shall not, so far as may be possible, bear a less proportion to the total number of members elected thereto, than the total number of Parsees, Christians, Hindus or Mahomedans, as the case may be, in such electoral jurisdiction, bear to its total population." Mr. Norton, who proposed the resolution in a very able and incisive speech, remarked "But recollecting as we do the practical conditions under which we live, recollecting the differences of caste, of custom and of creed that prevail in India, it is absolutely essential that any scheme which is to receive the sympathy of the people of England should bear upon its face clear proof that it takes into cognizance and protects the interests of minorities. Now, gentlemen, in that respect there cannot be any well-founded criticism of the measure which I have had the honour to move, because legislative protection of minorities is expressly therein provided and not left to the varying discretion or the varying passions of the human breast. Our scheme sets forth explicitly that electoral college, when it elects, shall necessarily, no option being left in this matter, elect a certain minimum percentage of Christians, Mahomedans, Parsees or Hindus to their respective legislative councils. So that at any rate the members of council, when elected, will represent, in the ratio of the populations to which they belong, their various interests." It does not lie within the province of this communication to discuss whether in the present educational condition of the Indian society the test of population is the right one to be applied throughout the country. But I think I have conclusively shown that, whatever the demerits of the Madras scheme, Sir Richard Garth's objection that it would fill the councils with Hindus exclusively rests on no foundation whatever and I am extremely sorry that some of your English contemporaries have made the most of it and written exultingly about his disapproval of Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill, in complete ignorance of the real nature of the proposal adopted last year in Bombay. Sir Richard Garth also forgets to note that Government will always be in a position to redress any inequalities in the representation of minorities and that persons, like Messrs. Dadabhoj Nowrojee, Budruddin, Mehta, Nulkar, Javerilal, and Ranade, will command the confidence and respect of all classes of people irrespective of their divergent creeds or customs.

I see clear symptoms of a reaction in this presidency and also in Bengal against the scheme proposed last year. But I have nowhere discovered any serious attempt to work out fully any other scheme. The proposals accepted by the previous Congresses are, in my opinion, provokingly vague and open to serious objections in some important respects. I have several times put the following questions to the champions of what is generally known as the original Bombay scheme but have never received satisfactory answers to most of them:—(1) What efficient safeguards does it suggest or provide for the protection of minorities, as are to be found in the Madras scheme? (2) Are all Municipal bodies to be given the power of electing members on the Legislative Councils and if not, on what principles are some of them to be debarred from the enjoyment of that privilege? (3) If Chambers of Commerce are to be allowed the same privilege, on what grounds can other influential commercial or public bodies be denied that right? (4) How can government be induced to confer a similar privilege upon native or other public associations whose constitution depends mainly upon the willingness or otherwise, on the ability or non-ability of people to pay the requisite yearly subscription? (5) Is the privilege which it is proposed to confer upon Universities to be confined to fellows only or extended also to graduates and to the educated professional classes in the mofussil? (6) How are the commercial, municipal, University and other public bodies to exercise their franchise of election, directly or through the medium of an electoral college? (7) How are sowkars, shettias, zemindars, inamdars, sirdars and pensioned officers, quite capable of exercising the franchise but who are not members of any municipal, commercial, or public body or association, or the landed and agricultural interests, to make their voice effectually heard? (8) Chambers of Commerce and Universities are already represented, unlike other public bodies, in the presidency city municipalities and is it just to other large and important interests that they should be allowed to exercise a disturbing influence upon the composition of the enlarged Councils through their municipal representatives, especially if they are to enjoy the privilege of a separate and distinct representation for themselves? (9) In the election of members, is the principle of territorial representation to be applied? If so, in what proportion are they to be allotted to the provinces of Gujarat, Sindh, the Konkan, the Deccan, and Canara? If not, how can a body of voters in Sindh, for example, be expected to vote intelligently in favour of rival candidates in Canara or Gujarat? I at once admit that in the existing social and political condition of this country, it is nearly an impossible feat to construct a thoroughly logical and unexceptionable scheme for the improvement of our Councils, as is postulated in the above questions. I am, therefore, ready to admit further that the principle of reasonable compromise ought to be the basis of our political demands. But I am not prepared to hold that in arriving at such a compromise, the difficulties I have referred to can be put aside with a light heart or without bestowing patient consideration on the subject with a view to meet them as far as possible. The Madras scheme disposes of most of the questions I have urged and besides secures a measure of popular representation which is in its essence free from government interference. But what I object to most in it is the illogical and cumbrous method for the election of members on the Viceregal Council through the intervention of electoral colleges. This defect, however, can be easily remedied by modifying the scheme in the light of the amendment proposed by Prof. Tilak but which was, in my judgment, unwisely rejected by the Fifth Congress. Another fatal objection to the scheme is that with such property and educational qualifications, as have been laid down, the composition of the electoral bodies in question can not be determined beforehand with a view to assure ourselves how far such bodies can be safely trusted to discharge their functions in a reliable and satisfactory manner. At least with the statistical information at my disposal, I have been unable to answer the question as to how far the electorates under the rival schemes would coincide with or differ from each other. Nor have my friends whom I have consulted been able to enlighten me on the subject. The idea of electoral colleges is usually associated with republican forms of government and this feature of the Madras scheme is likely to alarm people ignorant of the real nature of the demands of the Congress which only asks for a partial recognition of the elective principle and not for a representative form of government in its usually accepted sense in Europe or America. This is perhaps not a very serious objection. There are other minor objections which it is not necessary to discuss here in this already lengthy communication.

I see some influential native journals expressing their conviction that provided the principle of election is granted, the mode of election is of secondary importance. I confess I can not accept this view. I think India is bound to have her Councils improved and enlarged on a partially elective basis within the course of the next five or ten years. But thoughtful students of history will agree with me in my view that if the elective councils are not to be allowed to degenerate into sham councils like the existing ones, a scheme has yet to be formulated which shall neither be too wide or extravagant in its scope, nor too narrow and indefinite so as to create countless inequalities and needless irritation by the creation of invidious distinctions and by ignoring influential interests. From my examination of the two rival schemes referred to above, it will be seen that I disapprove of both as they stand. The advocates of the Bombay scheme throw the entire responsibility of working it out upon Government. This is, in my opinion, hardly just and if they wish to make their voice heard, it is necessary that they should formulate their proposals in such wise as will convince others that it will smoothly work to the satisfaction of all interests. I have also indicated on what lines both the schemes can be remodelled and I earnestly hope that this year's Congress will once more address itself to this all important subject and accept a reasonable compromise which will meet, as far as possible, the views of all the friendly critics of the Congress programme like Sir Richard Garth and Sir William Hunter.

CONDITIONS OF SALE.

1. The Commissioners' limit will be kept in a closed cover, and the highest bidder above this limit is to be the purchaser; if any dispute arise as to the last or highest bidding for the lot, the same shall be put up again and resold.

2. A deposit of 25 per cent. on the amount of the purchase-money is to be made by the purchaser immediately upon the lot being knocked down, and in default thereof, the premises to be immediately put up and resold at the risk of the first purchaser.

3. The title to the property will be a conveyance from the Commissioners.

4. The residue of the purchase-money shall be paid within 15 days of the date of sale; and in case of default in payment of such residue, the purchaser shall forfeit his deposit, which shall be received and taken as and by way of liquidated damages. The sale to such purchaser shall be wholly at an end, and the Commissioners shall be at liberty to resell the same without any reference to such first purchaser but at his risk.

5. The Commissioners will, if required, furnish a deed of conveyance, such conveyance being prepared by the solicitors of the Corporation at the expense of the purchaser, who will likewise have to bear the cost of the stamp duty and registration, and of any attested copies of deeds or convenants to produce those that may be required.

6. The Commissioners will enter into no other covenant than that they have done no act to encumber.

7. The plan of the several lots may be inspected at the Municipal Office from the undersigned.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

SAVED.

From the Sheltering Arms.

The wind is spent and the gale is past,
And the morning sun shines forth at last ;
It shines on a strip of yellow sand,
And a good ship sinking in sight of land.

Over her deck and her battered side
Lazily washes the ebbing tide ;
Out of the struggle and deadly strife
Lo ! nothing saved but a baby life.

A wee frail thing is the one poor waif,
A wee frail thing to be sound and safe ;
But all forgotten its brief alarms,
It gaily rows the stranger arms.

A sailor looks at the little form—
" 'Tis a tiny craft to have stemmed the storm !"
He sighs a bit as he bends him low,
And his thoughts fly back to the long ago.

Just such a babe on his young wife's breast,
With clinging fingers his own caressed ;
Just such another—but where is he ?
Wrecked on the voyage of life, maybe.

Is this but spared that in years to come
It may drift away from its heavenly home ?
The baby laughs as his boy once did ;
Ah ! will it be so ? Nay, God forbid !

The sailor's hand has a gentle touch
For the sake of the lad he loved so much ;
And soft from his lips are the words that fall ;
" God bless the children—God keep them all !"

BALLAD OF THE WHEEL.

Through the winding lanes where willows lean,
And the stately elms their shadows throw,
Past the woodland bowers of sunlit green,
Where the dusky brave, with bended bow,
In the hallowed time of the long ago,
Would soft, like a stealthy panther, steal,
We fling dark care to the winds that blow,
And spin away on the whirling wheel.

By the highways broad, where, fair, is seen
The bloom of the alder, white as snow,
Down hillsides steep on the road between
The vineyards wide with their vines a-row,

Nigh meads where the murmuring brooklets flow,
And rushes tall in the breezes reel,
We fling dark care to the winds that blow,
And spin away on the whirling wheel.

On days when spring is a verdant queen
And bright-eyed buttercups gleam and glow
'Mid hours when the forest's emerald sheen
Is scorched by suns that the tropics know,
In autumn tide, ere the winter's woe,
Whether bells of morn or eve outpeal,
We fling dark care to the winds that blow,
And spin away on the whirling wheel.

ENVOY.

Come, riders all, be ye swift or slow,
And join in the praise of the steed of steel !—
We fling dark care to the winds that blow,
And spin away on the whirling wheel.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

JACQUES has outfasted Succi. The Italian fasted 40 days on water but the Frenchman lived for 42 days on his own mysterious powder, which did not exceed in weight $2\frac{1}{2}$ ounces. He lost in weight 28 lbs 3oz or 6lbs less than Succi.

THE electrical execution of Kemmler at Auburn on the 7th August, has given rise to a host of opinions. The newspapers of New York do not condemn it all round. The Sun and the World are against a repetition. On the other hand, the New York Times, the Herald and the Tribune consider the process improvable, and even now no worse than hanging. The Medical Record, whose editor was witness to the death, takes it to be the first step towards the abolition of the capital punishment. Other doctors and electricians too have spoken. They are divided in opinion, except in one particular, namely, that death was absolutely painless, there being instantaneous cessation of consciousness. That surely is the most important point. Some experts—the modern tendency is to submit to experts unreservedly—say that life was extinct with the first shock, and the struggles that shocked the observers were only mechanical movements. The Agamemnon of the E(e)ls.—Mr. Edison—is disposed to think that the current was wrongly applied ; that the route which lay through a bone contact should have been made through the hands, then the electricity would have followed the blood to the heart. The humanity of this instantaneous painless death, supposing it was so, is doubtful, when you take into account the time for preparing the victim for the fatal current. As for the enthusiastic Medical Record, we do not see the editor report that Kemmler, as he passed out of the world, imported to him his sensations.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

Put on the electric rack, he did not exclaim, Oh.....the bliss of dying !
 The world recedes ; it disappears !
 Heaven opens on my eyes ! my ears
 With sounds seraphic ring :
 Lend, lend your wings ! I mount ! I fly :
 O grave ! where is thy victory ?
 O death ! where is thy sting ?

THE Home Secretary has released, in consideration of his poor health, Mr. Ernest Parke, editor and proprietor of the North London Press, who was sentenced to a year's imprisonment for libel against Lord Euston. He had been twenty-five weeks in jail.

AT the Manchester Assizes, the Tichborne Claimant sued the printers and proprietors of Illustrated Bits for libel. It had commented on the plaintiff's candidature for Stoke. The defence pleaded justification and truth, except that the plaintiff was described as a convicted felon instead of a misdemeanant. In cross-examination, the plaintiff, while admitting his conviction for perjury in 1872, insisted on his innocence saying the jury that convicted him was packed. The verdict, however, went for the defendants, the foreman adding that there had been no libel. In India, the result would probably have been different. Here, it is an offence to call a spade a spade.

THE Chief Justice of Madras is reported to have remarked in an Appeal case that "in all such appeals Vakils other than those who had been engaged before the lower Court, were engaged, the result being that the Vakils appearing before the Appeal Court were in total ignorance of what really transpired before the lower Court, and consequently wasted much time in arguing on irrelevant preliminary questions. The practice followed in England in respect to this was that the same lawyers who had pleaded the case before the Lower Courts were also engaged for the case when it came on for hearing before the higher tribunals. If the English procedure were adopted much valuable time would be saved. He also observed that very often when the final disposal of a case was anticipated Vakils and Barristers kept changing places. This changing of Counsel without any apparent reason was to be deprecated and should be stopped."

THE case against Woomesh Chunder Ghose for causing the death of Chamatkaree by a rash and negligent act, being complete, he has been committed to the sessions. The medical evidence as recorded in the Police Court runs thus :—

"Dr. W. R. Edwardes, Resident Surgeon of the Eden Hospital, said he saw the deceased woman on the 27th July last, about an hour after her admission. She was then unconscious, suffering from fever. Her body was exhaling a most offensive odour, and was much swollen with fluid. There were also some abrasions on the surface. She was under his treatment for four days, and also of Dr. Joubert. She died on the 31st July, never recovering consciousness. In his opinion, taking the woman to the ghaut, letting her be confined there, leaving her in the open air after her confinement, without proper attendance, was most decidedly a very dangerous act, even in the case of a healthy woman. The woman died of blood-poisoning, complicated with Bright's disease. Blood-poisoning was induced by the woman not having proper attention after her confinement. From the facts of the case, which he had heard, neglect caused the blood-poisoning, and accelerated to Bright's disease."

THE same Hospital supplies another similar case. The death of a maid servant, a widow named Rajlukhi aged 22, of Parsee Bagan, is ascribed to an illegal operation performed on her. She was taken to the Hospital on the 4th seriously ill of fever and died there on the 22nd. But there is no evidence of the illegal operation.

EARLY in September, Lala Gobind Dass, B.A., a native of Bhera in the Shapore district, proceeds to England from the Punjab as this year's holder of the Government Scholarship of £200 a year for three years. He has chosen the University of Cambridge, and leaves Lahore early next month.

THE 1st of August 1890 will be a memorable day—though not to all a red letter day—on the East coast of Africa. On that day, the Sultan of Zanzibar proclaimed the abolition of slave traffic. It is not a small event. Besides its effect on the fortunes of the African races, it will crush a large commerce and ruin many Arab and Somali merchants. These men could not believe their senses when they heard the news or read the Edict. When there was no longer any room for doubt, they thought the world was coming to an end. On their recovery from this stunning blow, they put their wits together and repaired for complaint to the Sultan. His Highness had come very nearly to the same conclusion. The world had gone to the dogs and the end could not be long delayed. Meanwhile, there was no help for it but submission, with a good face if possible, or bad if not. The dogs are irresistible, and they are of a Newfoundland breed, at home on sea as on land. Resignation was the duty of the faithful. The Arabs came back crest-fallen. The discontent spread and the town was in alarm. There was no real fear of a revolution, however. Ten men-of-war were in harbour for guarantee against that.

THE great living Italian authority on Bright's disease is Professor Semmola. He attributes the disease, unless it is hereditary, to food rich in nitrogen and too much of it. His recipe is—Avoid gravy soups, juicy meats, egg whites, and rise from the table with an appetite.

WE read—

"Strawberries have the reputation of ameliorating and even curing gout and rheumatism. The great chemist, J. B. Dumas, was particularly fond of this fruit, and regarded it as an agreeable medicine. Berzelius, the Swedish chemist, also considered it an antidote to maladies of a gouty nature. As certain compounds of lithium have the like property, M. Mornet has recently analysed the strawberry, but even spectrum analysis has failed to detect the presence of lithium, except in certain cases, and in these a mere trace was observable. At the same time, and especially in the larger varieties, he discovered a considerable proportion of phosphates."

This is but one out of numberless instances of waste of time and faculties after a gross theory of medicine. The relation between drug and disease, or health for that matter, is a most subtle one which it is vain to seek. Chemical analysis is mere child's play before this mystery of mysteries of Nature. The Chemistry of the Future may possibly grasp it. But as yet there is no chance. The imagination of the seer may dream the truth, but your rude laboratory will toil in vain.

THE following was lately going the round of the press :—

"It will be learned with some astonishment that Mormonism is flourishing under the British flag while being persecuted out of existence on its native soil of America. A Mormon convention has just closed its sittings in New Zealand. It was officially reported to the convention that there are 3,000 Mormons in that colony, and that 500 converts were made during the past year."

Not in the least. There will be no astonishment to those who know the latent leaning to Joe Smithery in the English heart. It was the Exodus of the Faithful from Wales and Britain that swelled the numbers of the disciples of the new Prophet of Polygamy. And New Zealand is Great Britain over again in the Pacific Ocean.

A CHEQUE in favor of one Suleiman on the New Oriental Bank, Bombay, was stolen in transit through the post. It never reached the real party, but payment on it was, unknown to Suleiman, obtained, apparently on forged endorsement. Suleiman sued the Bank in the Small Cause Court for the amount of the cheque. The Chief Judge decreed the suit, saying the drawees were not discharged by the payment in due course. On appeal, the High Court confirmed the order. That seemed to be the end of it. And verily for a poor cheque of a few hundred Rupees this was enough litigation. And, indeed, what more remained to do? Surely, this bagatelle could not possibly be taken up to the Privy Council? Be that as it may, there was scope for well paid for ingenuity even in this country. There are lawyers and lawyers, solicitors and attorneys, Vishnu and Siva, Kartik and Gonesh, Ormuzd and Ahriman. There are those who cannot believe in finality in a litigation in British courts, unless in the finality of the financing. The Bombay bank did not for the nonce grudge Suleiman the amount of the cheque even though they had once paid for it. They fretted under the evil precedent, prejudicial to all banking. So, reluctant to accept their defeat they were prepared to go to more expense if there was a way of getting out of it. Of course there was. Try a review. And so they tried a review on the ground that the plaintiff had already elected to treat the instrument as a Bill and could not elect afterwards to treat it as a promissory note. The High Court now reversed the former order, holding that there was an election by the plaintiff and the instrument having been treated as a cheque, the drawees were discharged. The cheque had been honored as soon as presented and there was no default in payment.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE Sikkim Treaty has been ratified. The Englishman reveals the secret hitherto observed that thereby China gives up her claims to jurisdiction beyond the frontier of Tibet. Sikkim is relieved of one grade of overlord to be left entirely at the mercy of foreigners. Does China give up Nepal too?

ON the 28th, a heavy storm passed over the Baltic Sea and Gulf of Finland. The River Neva rose, overflowed its banks, and partially inundated St. Petersburg.

THERE is strike among the coal-miners in Belgium. The strikers number 17,000 men. They demand revision of rules and universal suffrage.

THE Australian strike gathers strength. The miners at Newcastle, New South Wales, have struck work. The gas stokers in Melbourne have followed suit. The police in Sydney and Melbourne has been reinforced and special constables sworn in.

CHOLERA has invaded England. Last week in London, there were twelve deaths from cholera and choleraic diarrhoea.

THE potato blight is spreading in Ireland. According to the Land Commission, it has overtaken all the counties.

HOMELESS and repentant, Poor Dhulip has availed himself of the Queen's pardon and has arrived at Folkestone. We suppose he and his family have given up all claims to the sovereignty of the old Kingdom of Lahore, in consideration of a good round sum, in hand—that being the condition of the return to favour urged by the Ministry.

WHAT yet remained of the British heroes who fell at Waterloo have been collected and deposited in the cemetery at Evere, near Brussels, and a monument erected over them. On the 26th, the Duke of Cambridge unveiled the memorial amid torrents of rain—type of the showers required to wash the sin of "the red rain" shed on the spot seventy five years back!

A VIENNA telegram of the 26th speaks of the total destruction of the place from which the name of the famous wine Tokay is derived. Seven thousand inhabitants are said to be without home and food.

COUNT Villanova and eight others set out on Monday to ascend Mont Blanc. But before they could reach the summit, the whole party perished. Particulars are not reported.

THE Emperor William bade farewell to the Czar on the 23rd. The day before, General Von Caprivi and M. De Giers held a quiet confab—which may lead to international disquiet and trouble.

THE poor Jews! There is little hope of mercy for the Elect race at the hands of Orthodox Russia. The Christian—after a sort—Czar is still at them. He has not abandoned the idea of their segregation. The Daily News' Odessa correspondent states that an Anti-Semitic Edict will be published in October with a supplement excusing the severity of its provisions. The following are the principal clauses of the projected ukase:—

"1. The provisional laws of the 3rd May, 1882, forbidding the Russian Jews to reside in the rural districts and villages, to possess land there, to farm, manage, or let landed estate, are now to apply to the whole of Russia, including all the ten governments of the Vistula (Poland) not heretofore included in the said laws.

2. Throughout the Empire Jews may only reside in the cities and market-towns, but not in any villages. Those who before 1882, resided in villages affected by the said provisional laws, and those who resided in other parts of the Empire not affected by them and who now reside in the rural districts, may continue to reside there. But all others residing in villages shall be forcibly expelled therefrom.

3. Those who by virtue of the 2nd rule are permitted to remain in the villages shall be regarded as interned there. They may not remove to any other village, not even if it be in the same Commune. Any urban Jew who wishes to stay temporarily in a village, or any village Jew who wishes to visit a village not his own, must be first provided with a permit inscribed with a limit of time. Any breach of this regulation will be punished by imprisonment.

4. All Jews who may, under the 2nd rule, be allowed to remain in the villages, will be subject to the local municipal police.

5. Jews will only be permitted to possess landed estate if it be situated in the place of their domicile and so long only as they may enjoy the right of domicile there. They may not sell their landed estates to other Jews and may only bequeath them to a next of kin, the heir holding under the like conditions. Otherwise the landed property must be sold to Christian by the owner or his heir, or, in default of either of these alternatives, by the police administration. The like rules are to apply to the real estate of Jews residing in towns.

6. (Here follow minute and detailed instructions for settling the lists of Jews having right of domicile in each district, for keeping the lists close and revised to date).

7. The temporary permits for leaving the place of domicile will only be granted to Jews who require to visit the markets or fairs in the country, or to those occupied in the carrying trade. But the duration of the permit will be strictly limited, and the traveller will be under careful surveillance. In general terms, Jews are to be regarded as having no right of access to the rural districts.

8. Merchants of the first guild, Jews who have completed their studies in a high school, and those engaged in farming on a Jewish agricultural settlement, will not be subjected to the restrictions as to movement from place to place; but they will be subject to the foregoing rules as to the possession, sale, and bequest of landed estate. Jewish merchants of the first guild only will be permitted to acquire land in the rural districts, but only for the purpose of establishing factories, but only provided that they obtain the special authorisation of the Minister of the Interior. In the ten Governments or the Vistula (Poland) the Minister will have the right to strictly limit the extent of land so acquired."

THE Municipal Commissioners have had the good sense to return Baboo Joygobind Law as their representative on the Port Trust. The threatened catastrophe has been averted.

THE rise in exchange has alarmed the import traders. On Wednesday, there was a largely attended meeting, in the rooms of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, of the members of firms engaged in that trade of Calcutta, to discuss the situation and, if possible, to adopt a line of action. Mr. G. A. Walker, of Gisborne & Co., was voted to the Chair. He advised those present to sink all personal considerations for the general good. A sort of combination was suggested, but the votes shewed that twelve firms were for and twenty against it. There the matter ended and the assembled merchants should have dispersed and returned to their respective counting houses. This was too natural and straightforward for some. Accordingly, there was a resort to Oriental diplomacy. The meeting at last adopted a resolution forming a Committee of twelve to consult the different import firms and find out whether they could not devise some necessary basis upon which all could work together for the common good.

IT is the season of floods, and they are more general this year. Our readers are already aware of the disaster on the Bolan railway. A correspondent from Patna, under date the 26th writes to a morning contemporary:—

"From the last fortnight it has been raining incessantly, and every creek and streamlet is full to overflowing. Chupra is in a deluge, and people have to approach it in boats. Sonapore is also under water, and there is no sign yet of the floods abating."

IN the Benares Division, in the Ballia district, the Ganges had for sometime past been edging nearer and nearer to the town and at last overflowed its bank east of Gola Ghat, and a portion of the town was flooded. The Ghogra rose too and submerged a tract in the same neighbourhood about Ubhaon and Sikanderpur. In the Gorakhpur district, the Ghogra, Rapti and Rohin are in flood damaging crops and sweeping away cattle. In the smaller towns of Gola, Barhalganj, Majhau, Deoria and Barhaj, the Bazaars are under water.

IN Bengal, several parts of the country are under water. There is distress in the Nuddea district. As yet it is but the first scratch of the calamity. In Moorshedabad, notwithstanding precautionary measures, the Laltakuri embankment gave away. The breach occurred at night at 10 on Monday. By this time both districts have been laid under water, to the loss of crops and cattle and houses. That is distress by flood in right earnest. That has been reached in East Bengal. The Districts of the Delta and about it have been generally submerged. In some the cattle have almost entirely perished and men are leading a miserable life.

LORD Connemara is reforming official manners. On reference, the Madras Government has decided that communication between Collectors and Chairmen of Municipal Councils shall be in the form of letters. That will undoubtedly remove a fruitful cause of unnecessary irritation. We wish the officials in other Provinces may take a leaf out of the revised Madras book of administrative etiquette. The form of ordinary daily correspondence between the Chairman of the Calcutta Corporation and his subordinate officers—in the form of memo without even the introducing "Sir," though it is not resented in the Municipal office, causes much surprise to outsiders.

THE spirit of reform is decidedly abroad in the Southern Presidency. The Inspector-General of Police, Madras, has strictly prohibited the Inspectors and Headconstables from purchasing, without express permission, food grains from heads of villages or rayyets within their jurisdiction. The complaint for non-payment for ordinary supplies to the policemen, who consider it their inalienable perquisite of office, must have reached its height for promulgation of such an order. But is the order expected to be obeyed?

There was, many years ago, a District Superintendent in the N.W. Provinces, who used to buy through the Police grain and fodder in the villages at his own price, and make a little business of it by supplying to the officials in his neighbourhood cheaper than the market, thus pleasing and profiting in the same breath.

HERE is progress at the capital of Upper India—with a vengeance:—

"Turba, the Pasi, who was reported to have committed a daring theft in the house of Mr. Breckenbridge, of the Accountant-General's office, in Colonelgunj, sometime in July last, and at whose request no criminal action was taken in the matter, framed a charge of defamation against Mr. Breckenbridge and his son, under section 500, I. P. C., before Captain G. B. Crawley, the Cantonment Magistrate. The Magistrate, after hearing the evidences of the witnesses, both for the prosecution and defence, on Thursday (Aug. 21), acquitted the two accused."

That requires some explanation to the uninitiated reader. The Pasis are the lowest class of publicans—sinners too, as a general rule. They are the toddy-sellers who living in secluded spots in the heart of the jungle, are understood to vary the monotony of their occupation and the dreariness of their life with the excitement of crime. On the report of any occurrence the Police are sure to watch their Pasis. Polluted by their unhallowed profession, without character or wealth to recommend them, they are among the despised classes. To think that one of such a lot should persecute two honest men through the magistracy! To think that he should thus treat them after having robbed them! To think that he should thus dare to molest them for having dropped their prosecution against him for a daring robbery in their house! Verily the education of our people under British law has been nearly finished. Well may the Henry Maines and Grant Duffs congratulate their countrymen on their success in moulding the Indians to a!

THE Secretary and Treasurer to the Anglo-Indian Family Benefit Fund reminds the Mofussil members that "when a reply to a communication is needed, it is necessary to enclose a stamp for such reply." Mr. Fox or the Fund evidently does not take into consideration the fact that postage stamps being money, cannot, under the postal law, be enclosed in a letter that is not registered. That means two annas more in addition to the stamp for reply. A question to the Post office thus suggests itself. Can a stamp for reply be attached to a postcard without breaking the law? The reply postcard is carried free, why then not the stamp for reply? This justly points to the need of a change in the law or relaxation in the rule.

ONE Meheruddin Sheikh was cited as a witness in a counterfeit coin-ing case at the last Alipore Sessions. He failed to enter appearance and give evidence. He was therefore tried by the Joint Magistrate of Sealdah for contempt of court and sentenced to two months' rigorous imprisonment.

We are afraid, this Joint of the Law, in his zeal to uphold the majesty of law, has exceeded his lawful authority by awarding hard labor instead of simple imprisonment.

UNDER the heading of "Alms vs. Tamasha," a morning contemporary publishes the following letter over an unknown signature:—

"Sir,—During the late visit of His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal to Bhagulpore on the 9th instant, Rai Wooma Churn Bose, Bahadoor, Manager, Bareilly Raj, under orders from Raja Padmanund Singh, Bahadoor, of Bareilly, distributed alms to about 4,000 beggars in honour of the visit, which is preferable to fireworks, &c.—Yours, &c."

We wonder whether the above was telegraphed. The writer is certainly a master of the telegraphic style. What is killing two birds with one stone to a sportsman who with a single scratch of his quill bags a whole lot of game? He serves the Lieutenant-Governor, the manager Bahadoor, and his Raja master all at once, and is yet far from used up. He concludes with a sermon and a satire against the weak multitude who, far less enlightened than his Raja and without the resources of his manager, waste their money on illuminations and fire-works and nautches. Indeed, though the satire is general, the hit will strike the Shaoos and Shah Sahebs of a neighbouring town. And all this in a sentence of no particular length. As for the Raja, he secures the interests of both worlds, serving God and man in the same breath. Surely, so much was never made of so little. The benefaction is of the most commonplace. Such as it is, its nature and pecuniary value are left beautifully vague. We are only told of "alms to about 4,000 beggars." The next best thing to personal wisdom for a nobleman is to have a prudent manager.

After all, the pity of it, Iago!—O, Iago, the pity of it, Iago! is that the imps of our contemporary's Pandemonium have made a mess of the identity of the exemplary almsgiver. Although his touter took care, twice in the course of his single-sentenced epistle, to give the territorial designation of the Raja, they have, with characteristic malignity, twice given it wrong. They have transported him far, far from his natal plains to Bareilly—not even the nearer Roy Bareilly but the farther one. What a calamity if the world, headed by the Viceroy and members of Council, the Secretary of State and Council, the two Houses of Parliament, above all, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal and his Secretaries, should think that the "alms to about 4,000 beggars" were given by the Raja of Bareilly—whoever he might be!

HERE is a pretty—indeed prodigiously pretentious—specimen of Khas British imperspicacity culled from the Press at Home:—

"The floor of the House of Lords was occupied yesterday by those eminent legislators Lord Stanley of Alderley and Lord Denman. It is difficult to decide who of the two is the greatest orator or the most successful law-maker. Some say the one and some say the other, and some say that neither the one nor the other is great or successful. But that is envy. This is certain, that they both talk a lot, and with little—well, we won't say what. Lord Stanley wanted to know something about Dum Dum, and Lord Cross was not in a position to tell him anything about Dum Dum, which is to be regretted. Not because Lord Stanley did not get the information he wanted, but because the noble lord will make this the excuse for another speech. And between you and the doorpost, and in the bussum of the family, the House doesn't care for Lord Stanley's speeches."

So much the worse for the House! If after receiving a present of empire and afterwards undertaking direct government of it by shelving and dismissing the donors, the Houses will not listen to complaints, retribution is as certain as day follows night. Then no small part of the responsibility for the result will attach to such frivolous public advisers as these. It was thus that the Houses lost America. If Lord Stanley is not listened to, when speaking in the cause of good government for England's dependent Empire, it is nothing to him; the misfortune is England's and that empire's. Nor is the neglect a portion peculiar to himself. He shares it with his betters—the greatest orators and statesmen—the Chathams and Burkes and Foxes.

We hope the case is not so bad as this smart paragraphist would represent it. His sneers at Lord Stanley are wholly gratuitous. This nobleman is no bore. A scholar of serious quiet pursuits, a traveller and a man of the world in the best sense, who has seen many countries and mingled with life in all parts of the globe, he has not in him the making of one. Nor has he any temptations to allure him in that direction of senatorial eloquence. As a member of the Upper House, he is under no obligation to Buncombe. There is not the slightest reason why he should be disregarded. He is no agitator always putting himself in the path of administration or dogging the heels of authority. He is neither a booby of a hereditary legislator nor a restless young lord of ambition. His special laurels are cultivated in a different field. He is one of the most learned men in the House or out of it, with an uncommon gift of tongues. That such a man, withal so modest, so moderate, so considerate, should not be listened to with respect, specially when speaking in the name of an absent people!

So far as we know and can judge from this distance, it is nonsense to talk thus of Lord Stanley of Alderley. He never takes up any matter without reliable information and due thought. Nor does he ask too many questions. If half a dozen per session seem to these impatient journalists at home too many, they invite on themselves the rebuke which Burke administered to those who complained of his boring Parliament and the public with Eastern affairs. They may be reminded that India is not exactly of the dimensions of a British county or two, or of the nature of a larger New Forest with a few miserable denizens scattered about and a few hunters and poachers. Lord Stanley does not always make a fuss in the House at all, but, as we have had occasion to know in a few instances, quietly lays the papers received from India privately before the Secretary of State. Thus he is able to do more good than by figuring as a questioner in the House to be put off with evasions and delays. In one Madras case he positively refused to bring the matter into the House, thus disappointing his friends, but he did not neglect the subject and, we believe in his own way, procured as much alleviation of suffering as was possible under the circumstances. To charge such a man with anything like notoriety-hunting is the veriest recklessness of journalism.

We have read with much interest in the Bradford Observer, Mr. Carne's elaborate defence of the changes in his opinion on the Home Rule question of which much capital is made by his political opponents. The Irish question has been such a trying one to politicians of all ranks and grades, that one need scarcely feel ashamed of any apparent want of firmness upon a subject on which the Grand Old Man himself has passed through many phases. Mr. Carne, however, met his critics boldly in the face and made a thoroughly able and straightforward vindication of his conduct.

We find ourselves misunderstood in our obituary notice of the late Mr. Montague Bradford. That notice has been taken in certain quarters as at once an attack on the management of the General Hospital where he died, of the doctors and the nurses, and a reproach to the deceased gentleman's relations and friends. There could not be a more utterly erroneous impression. It must be the result of hasty reading, or we do not think much of the judgment of the reader. So far as we have accidentally caused pain, we are truly sorry. We dare say the Hospital is a wellconducted institution. A charity for Europeans cannot be aught else in India, specially one that is freely resorted to by the highest class in the land—the ruling class to wit. That was the very argument put forth by Lord Macaulay for placing Europeans and natives under the jurisdiction of the country courts. We do not know who the doctors were who treated or the nurses who attended, nor care. Even by the phrase "nursed by mere mercenaries" we did not cast any reflections on the noble Sisters of Charity who did nurse the young man. We meant to contrast hospital nursing—nursing by strangers that is—with nursing by one's own people—nearest and dearest ones—at home. The payment or non-payment is not the question. It is the natural relation between the nurse and the nursed that is important. Nor did we impute inhumanity or neglect to the numerous Europeans, whether civil or military or mercantile, who were wont to associate with him in better days and who loved him. How could we malign those whom we do not know? We did not know either Sisters or brothers or cousins or friends or physicians, any more than we knew the deceased. Is it suspected that our notice was the doing of a European? A preposterous suggestion! The Oriental breathes in every line, as he who runs may see. We did not dream of any of the things imputed to us. Our cue was different. Our purpose was higher and more philosophical. Our object was to attack manners, not men. We passed individuals by, to compare systems. We tried to express the Oriental horror of sickness and death in a hospital, no matter how wellconducted, no matter if Æsculapius himself were the attending physician, with Hippocrates and Galen, Celsus and Avicenna for dressers, no matter if the angels from Heaven themselves nursed—and the Bishop himself, instead of his Senior Chaplain, preached. It was the farthest from us to suggest that Europeans are bad or cruel or worse than Asiatics or Indians, or that Mr. Bradford's friends had neglected him. As to the latter point we knew nothing. We have since learnt with pleasure, what we before took for granted, that every attention was paid to him by numerous friends of Mr. Bradford. But for all that the desolation of a death in a foreign land, away from family, from father and mother, in a public institution, afflicted us with pity that would find expression. All that we have been told, during the week, in public and in private, about the advantages of such a resort, even for those who can pay and have friends to look after them and minister to their necessities and their weakness, have not, we confess, reconciled us to the idea of such a "constructive" home of final departure from the world.

THE last Calcutta Correspondence of the East is a protest from the centre of the camp against the professions and pretensions of our "Patriots." The writer adduces some remarkable facts. First, he refers to the approaching rapprochement between the two lifelong mutual enemies, the Editor of the Englishman and the Editor of the Indian Mirror, for no less a purpose than the interest of internal reform in Hindu society. He observes:—

"The fact that the veteran editor of the Indian Mirror is willing to co-operate with the editor of the Englishman in getting a law passed with the object of eradicating, if possible, the evils of child marriage by raising the age of consent from 10 to 12 years, proves, among many other things, how helpless our so-called leaders are in making themselves heard by men whom they profess to lead. If the Native Press faithfully echoes the sentiments of the Hindus whom it professes to represent, there would be no necessity, in our humble opinion, for seeking Government interference in putting down an evil which is admittedly eating into the vitals of the society. If the gentlemen, whom the Mirror and the Bengalee delight to call our 'natural leaders,' have really any hold upon people whom they complaisantly style their followers, we do not know why cannot they convince and induce them to take up this much-wished-for reform themselves, instead of going up to Government with folded hands and in a supplicating mood. It is a shameful thing that men who consider themselves fit enough to have a share in the government of a vast empire, are not, according to their own admission, strong enough to set their own domestic affairs in order. If the National Congress, with its appendage the Social Conference, be not equal to the task of bringing about reforms, which even the unlettered classes of the Hindu community, according to the Indian Mirror, are ready to welcome, how can we believe that such a body of powerless men as our leaders are, will ever be able to achieve anything, in any direction, worth the fuss they make every now and then. After all our 'leaders' are nothing but victims of an irrepressible Cacæthes loquendi!"

The writer next notices both the shallowness and the hollowness of the politics of the Patriots and exposes the disingenuousness of their proceedings. On the subject of the day, the reform of the Legislative Councils, he sees—

"Our countrymen of the 'Reform party,' as the dabblers in politics have recently begun to style themselves, have, it is well-known, a stock grievance which they seem to be fond of airing every now and then. Government they say, while nominating men for the Legislative Councils, Imperial and provincial, have, as a rule, pitched upon men who, barring a few exceptions, are mere 'Ornamental figure heads.' The intellectual portion of the community the 'natural leaders' of the 'great middle classes,' that is to say, argue they have been invariably left in the shade, and their claims to have a voice in the administration of the country's legislative affairs have been on most occasions ignored by our rulers."

He seems to regard these aspirations to be chimerical for long years to come. He has certainly nothing but honest scorn for the inconsistency of the Patriots. For he finds that

"Speaking in the name of democracy, as our leaders do in and out of season they have invariably selected to preside at their meetings and to occupy places of importance in their several committees, men simply because of their belonging to the aristocratic families without any consideration whatever, whether they possessed the requisite qualifications or not! Question the 'natural leaders' as to the integrity of their proceedings in this respect, and they will assure you in a confident tone and triumphant manner, that it is simply a stroke of policy that leads them now and then to take to the tactics of inviting the aristocrats to come and mix with them so that to prove to the world that their interests and those of the middle and lower classes are identical though in fact they may be poles asunder! Now, for such men, who would not for a moment hesitate, for the sake of a policy, to do things which are not quite akin to their hearts, to condemn Government in unmeasured terms for nominating scions of opulent families to seats in the councils, in accordance with, perhaps, a policy of the State, is, to put it mildly, quite unjustifiable."

He goes into proof of the sharp practice of the Patriots. He convicts them of, if not blowing hot and cold in the same breath, at least blowing one temperature in one country and blowing another temperature in another:

"To ask, for instance, Raja Peary Mohan to come and preside at a meeting of the Bengal Provincial Conference in 1888 and then to speak of him contemptuously on an English platform, as 'a titular Raja hailing from the suburbs of Calcutta' simply because he had voted for the imposition of the Salt tax from his place in the Viceregal Council some 3 or 4 years ago, is, to our thinking, shamelessly inconsistent."

That is pretty stiff, is it not? More to the same purport follows. The invitation to the Brahman Raja of Uttarpara to preside at their political and social meetings was by no means a case of personal partiality. Nor was it a solitary instance. Here is another. "We cannot," says the writer,

"consider it at all justifiable on the part of men who freely and mercilessly accuse Government of their undue inclination towards securing an aristocratic element for the Council Chambers of the Empire, to elect Raja Rajendra Narayan Deb Bahadur as President of the Indian Association—not that he possesses any superior claims to others for the position but because of his noble birth and high social position in the Hindu community. There was perhaps a time, when the Raja's election to the Presidentship would have been quite consistent and just the thing people wanted; but now, that he is old and infirm both physically and intellectually, it can scarcely be reasonably expected that he is of any practical service to the Association.

We have seen the Raja in the Town Hall on two occasions; once on the occasion of the public welcome accorded to Mr. Lal Mohan Ghosh on his return from England some three years ago, and again this year at the reception to Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea. On the former occasion the Raja was made to preside, and this year he was entrusted with the moving of an important resolution. On both these occasions he appeared in the hall supported by the arms of his younger kinsmen, and being, admittedly, a blind man, could not even read out the speeches himself prepared for him by officious friends. On the first occasion it was, we believe, Babu Krishna Bihari Sen who read the Presidential address; and on the occasion of the reception accorded to Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea the resolution which stood in the Raja's name had to be moved by a gentleman whose name we unfortunately cannot recall to mind at this time. Now, if this is not riding the constitution with a vengeance we do not know what it is. If jobbettes like these can be perpetrated by men who are practically powerless to do any thing good or evil so far as the community at large is concerned, we cannot say to what extent may not their disregard of public interests go once they are in power. If there was any thing wrong on the part of Government in nominating Raja Rupal Sing's Urdu speaking uncle a member of the Legislative Council of which Mr. Surendra Nath Banerjea seems to have made such a capital joke while in England in May last, what justification there was, we say, on the part of those who condemned our rulers in this connection, in making the two Mahomedan gentlemen move and support resolutions in the late Town Hall meeting in honor of Mr. Banerjea, in a language of which but few could understand a syllable?"

We should much like to see some young fire-eater who has sat at the feet of Gamaliel attempt an answer.

THE Nawab Bahadoor of Moorshedabad has no sooner recovered somewhat from his serious illness than he has resumed his career of beneficence. His charity is nothing of ostentation—no trap to catch applause—but a thing of Religion and the heart. A small part, however, of his benefactions reaches the newspapers. Many and multitudinous are the men, women and children whom he supports. He is constantly helping gentlemen in difficulty and ladies in distress. His charity leaves no sting, as charity does in many hands. He relieves without degrading. He too has lately given alms to thousands, during the Moharam, as a matter of course, and has, besides, distributed Rs. 1,000 among the poor inhabitants of the city including many respectable but deplorably destitute ladies who would sooner perish in seclusion rather than come out to beg and who must have their gifts reached to them at their own homes by female hands. May God bless him! It is a pity that Government has not armed him with sufficient means for the exercise of his goodness. A few such souls in every town would appreciably lessen the sum total of human misery.

THE Senate of the Calcutta University have at their to-day's meeting referred the case of the Ripon College back to the Syndicate for reconsideration. It is understood that, in view of the letter addressed to the Syndicate on the 14th instant by the Proprietor of that College, the Syndicate will now be disposed to deal leniently with the irregularities which took place. There was an unprecedented gathering.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Colds, Coughs, Shortness of Breath.—These maladies require early and unremitting attention, for if neglected they often end in asthma, bronchitis, or consumption. The Ointment well rubbed upon the chest and back, penetrating the skin, is absorbed and carried directly to the lungs, whence it expels all impurities. All the blood in the body is perpetually passing through the lungs, and there all noxious particles tending to disease can be quickly, thoroughly, and permanently neutralized, rendered harmless, or ejected from the system. Holloway's Ointment and Pills perfectly accomplish this purification; and through the blood thus cleansed, the influence of these wonderful medicaments reaches the remotest parts of the human body, and thus cures all diseased action, whether internal or external.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, AUGUST 30, 1890.

MOURNING IN MHOW.

NATIVE society in Central India has sustained a considerable loss in the death, on the 12th August, of Seth Sreeram Choonilal, head of the banking community and leader of the Hindus in general of the great British Cantonment of Mhow, in the neighbourhood of Indore.

He died rather suddenly after the operation of a carbuncle near the right ear. Though not a person of education, he was an able man of business, a shrewd man of the world, and a fine specimen of the native gentlemen of the old respectable type which is becoming extinct. Amiable and obliging in private, thoroughly loyal to the British Power and respectful to the officials, he was animated by a genuine public spirit. Although without the new learning himself, he had not been unobservant of the signs of the times, and was not jealous of new ideas or new men. It is not a little to the credit of this uncultured Bania in the recesses of Central India that he had realised, better than some of far greater pretensions in our midst, that the power of the purse and the influence of acres are no longer paramount factors in society and affairs. Perhaps, he had, like many of his betters, a weakness for popularity. If so, he had at any rate made sacrifices towards its attainment. He had certainly not shown the more diseased hankering for the empty honours which might be easily won by obsequious flattery to the local officials, coupled with the surrender of public interests. He was a courageous outspoken citizen, whom all classes of the native population looked up to, and who, we would fain believe, enjoyed, however unawarded, the respect of even the British officials. It was not easy engineering to introduce irrigation in the naturally and morally parched up arid desert of Central India—to sink the wells of a healthy public life. The Founder-President, down to his death, of the Central India Association, he was the leader of all public movements in that part of the country. The soul he was not. That honour must be given, willingly or unwillingly, to the Pioneer of all Progress in the different Provinces and parts of the Presidency and in the outlying lands out of Bengal Proper—the much-abused Baboo. At Mhow, as elsewhere, the new life originated with the little Bengali colony—the chief of it being, we believe, Baboo Mohendro Nath Chatterjee, pleader, editor of the plucky little Eastern Herald, and Secretary of the Central India Association. But the Baboos could do little without the hearty co-operation of the leading men of the permanent population. Of these, the deceased was the chief. He entered into all their plans with intelligent appreciation and unfeigned zeal. He had to sustain all the brunt of the struggle. He elected to be the marked man and uncomplainingly suffered all the obloquy and reproach. Who will grudge him the glory?

Seth Choonilal was far from happy in his personal life. His son died before him and he lost his son-in-law too. It is not necessary to tell our people what the burden of two young widows is—how the sight of his two girls, virgins to all intents and purposes, without hope of married life, daily chilled his soul. Then came a financial crash. He braved his accumulated ills with no small fortitude, and still went on pursuing his public duties. His fellow-citizens showed their regard for his worth and their estimate of his services by swelling the long funeral procession to the place of cremation and crowding round the bier to have a last look at the lifeless body. All classes joined in this mournful office.

Following close upon the death of Seth Choonilal, occurred a similar mournful event in the European society of the Cantonment. It was the death of Mr. Williamson of the 18th Hussars located there. This is a crack Regiment in the British Army, in every sense, and the deceased was one of its finest spirits. His funeral was a spectacle, attended as it was by every officer, of whatever class or degree, from the Major General Gillespie, C.B., commanding, downwards, who was not detained by duty. The deceased was beloved of the whole garrison and town. A man of rare amiability, a true officer and gentleman, he had the secret of winning hearts. It goes without saying that he was a man of education, having been educated at Oxford. Devoted to the drama, he was one of the chief spirits of the amateurs of the Hussars.

The presence of a first class regiment at a Moffusil station is luck itself to the place. The 18th Hussars have enlivened Mhow beyond many a great city of pretensions. They have a Dramatic Club which gives creditable performances. Nor is their talent and activity exhausted there. They have started a literary organ of their own. We have much pleasure in extracting two stanzas of a pretty tribute to the late W. C. Williamson from the Dramatic Club which we find reproduced in the Eastern Herald :—

We mourn the friend who kindly came to cheer,
Who each spare moment to give counsel seized,
As though our equals in our social sphere :—
Respect commanding, where his presence pleased.

Old Baliol ! Thou his alma mater proud !
Thou erst did glory in thy brilliant boy,
Who 'midst the plaudits of the learned crowd
In Grecian Drama showed ambition's joy.

From that specimen there can be no question of the conductors' capacity to make of the organ a clever thing. We hope the 2nd Middlesex Regiment of Foot which has recently joined will combine with the Hussars in the good work. From a metrical address in the name of the infantry regiment to the Hussars' journal published in the Eastern Herald, the Middlesex men are no unworthy comrades of the famous Sowars, whether in arms or in letters.

A MOURNING DIFFICULTY.

MR. Statesman the son does not see much in Reis and Rayyet to extract in his broadsheets. Mr. Statesman the father was known to all the world to be of a different mind. He not only admired this paper himself, but quarrelled with others for neglecting it. He quoted largely from it, in different parts of his journal, here, there, everywhere. He for sometime regularly opened a column with a distinct heading "Cuttings from Reis and Rayyet." Often did he tell us that he would quote the whole paper with pleasure but that it would be unfair to us. Times are changed. The old man has gone to Heaven. The taste of the young is notoriously fastidious. And truth to say, we are aging rather than *younger*ing. Nowadays we are scarcely remembered in the great Journalistic House in Chowringhee. It is a redletter week with us if Reis and Rayyet is heard of in our contemporary's paper. This promised to be such a week particularly. On Tuesday, a long leaderette of ours, on the lamented death of Mr. Montague Bradford, was reproduced with a short prefatory heading characterising it as a "sympathetic notice." Such fare after a long famine was joy indeed ! Alas ! it was a brief illusion !—mere Maya ! Soon the inevitable flux set in and, so far from recovering health and spirits, left us in a worse plight than ever. For, the very day of publication our brother received a new inspiration and the following morning he announced its character by way of a qualification of his appreciation of our leaderette. The previous praise, we must in fairness and thankfulness mention, was not at all withdrawn ; on the contrary, farther praise was bestowed ; what was sympathetic became excellent and sympathetic. In fact, everything was done to sweeten the bitter pill. We had been hasty and careless. Our article was thoughtless ; though "otherwise excellent and sympathetic," it was essentially "thoughtless." Our remarks were unjust and had caused pain. Clearly, he had received some communication. That was bad enough—not the communication but the new deep blue light mixed with the previous transparent white light. The acme was reached the following day. He had been receiving further communications, and one missile from a clerical knight seems to have upset our friend altogether. In publishing this "war minister's" manifesto, the editor not only throws us overboard but jumps after us himself. He goes into the confessional before his Padre and repents for his sin—not without a parting glance of affectionate tenderness at his old love. As much as to say that though, under ecclesiastical admonition to save his soul he has turned a good boy, he had not lavished his heart on an unworthy object. If his Confessor had only known that object, his saintly soul itself would have confessed its fascination and been fairly beaten. Our old young friend says :—

"As to ourselves we regret of course that the paragraph should have been reproduced among our extracts, but it is impossible for the editor of a daily paper to personally scrutinise before publication every line that appears in the paper."

So, after all, it was by the merest accident, unfortunate to the credit of our morning contemporary but to the advantage of Reis and Rayyet, if not by some manipulation of Brahmanic Black Art of our own, that our little article, together with the commendatory introduction, got printed in the Statesman of Tuesday. Thus, for a single day's ecstasy, we were condemned to sack-cloth and ashes for ever and a day.

Pleasantly apart, for the sake of our contemporary himself we regret the closing of a by no means formidable war with such a surrender. It was all the more a surprise after the doubts freely expressed by the editor as to his wisdom in publishing the letter of his clerical correspondent. At the worst, his responsibility in the matter was infinitesimal. Surely, an English paper might without offence reprint an article from the indigenous press, if only as a curiosity of native sentiment or even native impropriety, or savagery. As for this paper, he had, as he said, vouchsafed a true explanation. There the matter might have been left.

After all this criticism, and specially the "chaff"—rather solemn—of our opening, we are bound in all seriousness to acknowledge that, notwithstanding the final weakness to which our contemporary was betrayed, the Statesman from the first vindicated our good faith and the perfect innocence of our motive in inditing the obituary notice. We for our part would go further and deny the "thoughtlessness" and "injustice" imputed to our remarks, for we never made any remarks, at any rate consciously, against the hospital management, or the nursing of the good Sisters, or against the friends or relations of the deceased. Our contemporary hit the simple truth in saying that our

"remarks were merely the outcome of a strong feeling of sympathy for the lone sufferer, dying in a public hospital far away from home and loved ones—circumstances that are peculiarly repellent to the Hindoo mind. The feeling is a very natural one, and if Reis and Rayyet's remarks have occasioned pain in some quarters where they have been misconstrued, we are sure he will be the first to express his regret and disavow any such intention."

And this we do without the slightest reservation.

We cannot leave without expressing our amazement at the letter that the "Senior Cathedral Chaplain, and Chaplain of the Presidency Hospital" has thought fit to address the Statesman on this matter. Our contemporary might well have the "great doubts as to the wisdom of publishing this letter" which he confessed, and it would have been well for the poor gentleman's reputation had the editor shown the requisite firmness and quietly passed it to the limbo of literary vanities at the foot of every editorial table. Is he an Irishman landed in India by the way of the United States—specially the rowdy ones ? His name is Irish, but its spelling Transatlantic. Wellbore or, according to the American orthography, Welbore Macarthy as the appellation of our reverend Guroo, is a nomenclological contradiction in terms. "Macarthy" is Pat and comes pat and no mistake, in the case of a violent knight who flies to arms without occasion and explodes without powder or fire, and who is probably as ready, with as little reason, to swear eternal friendship. But, "Welhore"—there's the rub! We perceive no wellborne deportment—no trace of forbearance—no Christian meekness under suffering—no Christian charity in the least. The temper of this pluralist in the Church is more military—of the young Subaltern sort—than civil.

Bore he unquestionably is, but had bore, with his long rigmarole, no "wellbore"; an ill bore that bears no good to anybody—that bodes only mischief, and breeds trouble and hate and dissensions among mankind, setting class against class. His voluminous letter starts with the conviction, reiterated throughout, that we were actuated by malice towards the hospital—the doctors, the sisters, and all—as well as towards the friends of the deceased. Such a man never stays to inquire what possible motive there might be under the circumstances. Our clerical denouncer even denies the good feeling of our notice, and chides the Statesman for calling it "sympathetic." "I," says this reverend writer,

"have no hesitation in characterising that so-called expression of sympathy as a tissue of false representation."

Again,

"From such sympathy as the Reis and Rayyet has expressed for the family of Mr. Bradford, may we all be delivered in our day of trouble."

We know what the odium theologicum is, but one might expect it to be kept in abeyance so long as no polemics were stirring. The man of God speaks throughout with the greatest insolence of "this sympathetic Bengali," meaning himself. And this is the sort of men that is sent out to minister to the souls of the British in India and keep them in the path of religion so that they may be an example of the superiority of the Gospel to the Eastern world!

We almost deserved our fate. We have rarely written of any of our own people in such terms as we wrote of the young gentleman, whom we never saw, with whom we had no connection whatever, direct or indirect. And here is our reward. Happily, this clergyman is not the only surviving friend of the deceased. We have received acknowledgments from other quarters of our appreciative notice and of the good feeling which dictated the article.

THE FLOODS.

SINCE writing the paragraphs on this subject published above, we have come by farther news.

A Burisal correspondent of the Statesman reports the occurrence of a tornado which passed over that city on the night of the 4th instant. Several houses were destroyed, windows were blown off and trees uprooted. Its force may be imagined from the fact that a bamboo 12 feet long was found stuck half into the ground on one of the public roads. Fortunately, its ravages were confined over the bank of the river where there were no large population, and no life was lost nor was the damage to property great.

There is great distress in Nuddea. A part of the district has been flooded. The city of Kishnaghur looks like an island with a vast expanse of water on all sides. Cattle and cottages have been swept away and the head quarters and higher lands are crowded with refugees. Pitiable stories reach us of men carrying what crops they could hurriedly save from the flood on their heads but, being overtaken by the rising water, compelled to make their escape, resigning their precious load to the advancing flood.

A part of the Azimgunge Railway line is flooded, over which passengers have to make their way by boat or trolley. There are floods also, if not to the same degree, in Jessore. The river Hooghly below Calcutta is rising apace, and it is reported that it will attain the greatest elevation in the next two days when the level of the river will rise to a height of about 23 feet, submerging the riparian parts of the metropolis. Some of the riparian towns on the river are already under water which only subsides with the tides. While there is inundation in so many places, the loss of crops must come to no inconsiderable figure. No official account of the extent of the injury done so far has been published, but the distress must be particularly felt by the people of Nuddea, the inundation there exceeding anything in the memory of the oldest inhabitant of even that flood-ridden district. In the meantime, an appeal for assistance has been promptly made by the Rev. Mr. Clifford, Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, who had been stationed in Nuddea for some years and has now revisited the district.

While there is distress from over-much water in these districts, there is complaint of want of enough water in the districts of Hooghly and Midnapore. The rains there have been far below normal, so as to interfere with the progress of cultivation. What with floods in some parts and what with insufficiency of rain in others, the outlook for the province cannot be very hopeful.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

HOME DEPARTMENT.

The following despatch to Her Majesty's Secretary of State for India regarding the Draft Bill to make provision for the isolation of lepers and the amelioration of their condition is published for general information:

No. 39-Public—Medical, dated Simla, the 22nd July, 1890.

From—The Government of India,

To—The Secretary of State for India.

With reference to the correspondence marginally noted, we have

To Secretary of State, No. 45 (Public—Medical), dated 13th July 1889.

From Secretary of State, No. 66 (Statistics and Commerce), dated 5th September 1889.

and Administrations on the draft Bill to make provision for the isolation of lepers and the amelioration of their condition.

2. Before referring to the general opinions expressed by the Local Governments and Administrations and by the public bodies and individuals consulted by them, we desire to draw Your Lordship's attention to the fact that many of the medical men who have given their opinions in regard to the Bill have not stated whether they consider that leprosy in its different stages is communicable or not, and have apparently abstained from doing so under the impression that the Bill is based upon the assumption that leprosy is contagious. We think it right, however, to inform Your Lordship that many of the highest medical authorities in India consider that the evidence at present available goes to show that leprosy is only contagious in the sense that it is inoculable, and that inoculation plays only a very subordinate part in determining the spread of the disease. The very small number of authentic and unequivocal cases of communication of the disease from one individual to another, which even the strongest advocates of a belief in the influence of contagion are able to adduce, is considered by our medical advisers strongly to support this view. They also consider that the phenomena of the distribution of the disease within leprosy countries are altogether adverse to a belief in contagion playing any important part in causing the general diffusion of the disease. In Norway, for example, the disease appears to be almost limited to certain areas, such as the districts around Bergen, Molde, and Trondhjem; and in India the very unequal incidence of the disease over different parts of the peninsula is equally striking. Your Lordship will find an able paper on the subject by the late Dr. Lewis and Surgeon-Major D. D. Cunningham, F.R.S., printed as Appendix B to the Twelfth Annual Report (for 1875) of the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India. Dr. Cunningham, who in his capacity of Special Assistant to the Sanitary Commissioner with the Government of India is our chief scientific adviser, is of opinion that the evidence at present existent in regard to the communicability of leprosy is very imperfect, and that, such as it is, it is opposed to the theory that the disease is readily communicable by contagion in any stage, or that, even in the ulcerative stage of the disease, lepers are a source of any considerable danger to those with whom they may associate.

3. The opinions on the objects and scope of the Bill given by the Local Governments and Administrations, and by those whom they have consulted, exhibit, as might be expected in the present state of uncertainty as to the cause and character of the disease, great divergence.

The Madras Government considers that there is no reasonable room for doubt that, if it is intended to stamp out or materially reduce the disease, something far more thorough than the proposed legislation is essential. It holds that to effect this object it would be necessary to enact that any one found to be suffering from leprosy should be compulsorily removed to an asylum and detained there until cured or until death. The cost of such a measure would in the opinion of the Government of Madras be prohibitive, and it regards the small measure of seclusion proposed in the draft Bill as likely to have no appreciable effect on the spread of the disease, while the expenditure necessary to carry it out would absorb money which can, the Local Government thinks, be devoted with greater utility to general medical relief. The Governor in Council is therefore unable to approve of the proposed legislation, but he would give his support to an amendment of the law which would render it possible to control the carrying on by lepers of various avocations, such as those of butcher, baker, bazaar-keeper, barber, or washer-man, likely to spread the disease, provided that such control should be exercised not with the object of generally prohibiting lepers from earning their own livelihood, but with that of dealing with any special cases in which the danger of contagion might be shown to exist.

The views of the Bombay Government are in close accord with those of the Government of Madras. It considers that the Bill will be ineffectual in stamping out the disease unless it is made compulsory, so as to affect all lepers in every condition of life, and that its effects in mitigating the disease will be limited to removing from public view and providing for lepers who are unable to earn their own living. It would extend the operation of the Bill by including in it stringent provisions for the detention of persons who by working in various capacities may spread the disease among the public, and would have it declared to be an offence under the Indian Penal Code for a person consciously suffering from leprosy to omit to take effectual means for his own segregation, or to take measures to get himself placed by lawful authority in a retreat.

The Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal is prepared to accept the Bill as a tentative and experimental measure, intended only, should experience and further scientific enquiry demonstrate that it is required, to pave the way for more stringent legislation in the future; but he would add to it a provision similar to that suggested by the Governments of Madras and Bombay for controlling the exercise of trades by lepers, and to prohibit their use of public tanks, and possibly of public means of conveyance. The opinions of the numerous public bodies and associations consulted by the Bengal Government demonstrate how much public opinion in India is at present divided upon the subject of the segregation of lepers. The associations which are composed of natives of India do not regard the need for isolation as having been established, and are generally apprehensive lest diseases which are admittedly quite innocuous may be confounded with leprosy: those associations, on the other hand, which are composed mainly or entirely of Europeans and Eurasians regard the Bill as of too permissive a character.

The Lieutenant-Governor and Chief Commissioner of the North-Western Provinces and Oudh accepts the main lines of the Bill as it has been drafted, but is also in favour of extending its application to lepers engaged in trade or other occupations calculated to spread the disease, and of prohibiting any leper from using a public conveyance or attending a place of public resort.

The Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab would limit the provision of the Bill regarding the detention of lepers found asking for alms to wandering lepers or lepers begging in towns or cities or fairs, but would, at the same time, widen its terms so as to include all lepers, of whatever rank in life, if it can be shown that their behaviour is a source of danger to the public.

The opinions of those consulted in the Central Provinces is that legislation should be undertaken to check the spread of leprosy, and the Chief Commissioners both of those Provinces and Assam advocate the extension of the scope of the Bill so as to restrain lepers from pursuing avocations which are likely to favour the extension of the disease.

The Resident at Hyderabad would accept the draft Bill as it stands for Berar.

4. After considering the very conflicting opinions received from those whom we had consulted regarding the Bill, we deliberated whether it would not be desirable to allow the introduction of the Bill in an amended form, limiting its application, on the one hand, to persons suffering from the disease in an advanced and specially dangerous stage, and, on the other, extending the power of arrest and compulsory detention so as to cover all such dangerous lepers who might, after warning, persist in coming out and mixing with the public. We were, however, advised, as we have already observed in paragraph 2, that there is no safe basis for an enactment even of this restricted description.

5. His Excellency the Viceroy has recently received two unofficial communications from the Honorary Secretary of the National Leprosy Fund. With the former of these were sent copies of a pamphlet reporting the proceedings at a subscription dinner lately held in connection with the National Leprosy Fund under the presidency of His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. It is stated in this pamphlet that one of the objects of the Fund is the appointment of a Commission for not less than one year, to consist of three members nominated in England and two nominated by an Indian Auxiliary Committee, for the purpose of investigating the disease of leprosy in India. From the subsequent communication, which has just been received, it appears that the Committee of the National Leprosy Fund has determined that, before sending a Commission to India, it is desirable to collect by correspondence as much information as possible, and that with this object a Technical Secretary should be appointed for the term of not more than a year to collect from the medical officers of leper establishments and from others interested in leprosy throughout the world all available and useful information relating to the causes of, and cures for, the disease. The Committee proposes to publish in a condensed form in a journal the details thus collected, and to circulate the journal among those interested in the matter. We are instructing those of our medical officers who have had special opportunities for studying the phenomena of leprosy in this country to supply to the Secretary appointed for the purpose all particulars which they may have to communicate. We desire at the same time to inform Your Lordship that, while we cannot now pledge ourselves to accept the conclusions of such a Commission as the Committee of the National Leprosy Fund proposes to appoint, we shall be prepared, in the event of three members being eventually sent out as proposed from England, to depute two medical officers in the service of Government to co-operate with them, and to bear the cost of such deputation. We think that this would be preferable to leaving the selection of two Commissioners to an Auxiliary Committee to be formed in India.

6. Under these circumstances, and in consequence of the doubts which exist as to the contagious character of leprosy, even in an advanced stage, we have come to the conclusion that it is expedient to postpone legislation for the present, and we hope that the investigations above referred to may provide more definite information as to the causes of leprosy and the best means to be adopted for its prevention.

7. As the subject has evoked much interest in this country, we propose to make this Despatch public at the end of the week in which it will reach Your Lordship.

C. J. LYALL,

Offg. Secretary to the Govt. of India.

THE DUNLO CASE.—VERDICT.

The case in which Lord Dunlo sued for a divorce from his wife, Lady Dunlo (Miss Bell Bilton), was brought to an end late on the afternoon of July 31, after a hearing which lasted six days. The co-respondent was Mr. Isidor Wertheimer.

Mr. Lockwood, Q.C., in addressing the jury on behalf of Lady Dunlo, maintained that, with the exception of one incident, in which he could not help feeling that she was more sinned against than sinning, her whole life, as the jury must have seen, was blameless. Her letters to her husband, he maintained, were couched in terms which showed that she was a woman capable of deep feeling and affection.

Mr. C. F. Gill followed on behalf of Mr. Wertheimer; and Sir Charles Russell then rose to reply on behalf of Lord Dunlo. With regard to the conduct of Lord Clancarty, it had been alleged that he neglected his son's wife, and that he was a party to hounding her down, and was laying a trap for her. Lord Clancarty acted throughout on the view of not recognizing the marriage at all. It was further said that Lord Clancarty was responsible for Lady Dunlo's movements being watched. He was; and he must bear, for good or ill, the responsibility. Let the jury remember the position in which Lord Clancarty was placed. Here was a woman who had been on terms of intimacy with Weston, who after Weston's conviction had to all appearances been living under the protection of Mr. Wertheimer, and who when her husband left England apparently resumed those relations. Discussing the conduct of Wertheimer, the learned counsel did not deny that, mixed up with other motives, there might be a generous impulse on his part. "I do not deny," exclaimed Sir Charles Russell, "God forbid that I should—that men are incapable of generous and unselfish thought; but I do say that the man who has honourable and generous will make his generosity good, will prove his affection and his philanthropy in a way which would at least secure the object of his supposed respect and admiration from having the finger of scorn and reproach pointed at her."

Finally, Sir Charles asked the jury to say why Mr. Wertheimer should dangle about Lady Dunlo when she was a married woman. He had assisted her before her marriage, but a single word from her would have kept him off. They would have to ask themselves whether they could believe in these pure and Platonic feelings on the part of the co-respondent.

THE JUDGE'S SUMMING-UP.

Sir James Hannen proceeded, at half-past three o'clock, to sum up. The suit, he said, was clearly not promoted by Lord Dunlo, but by Lord Clancarty, who had given instructions that Lady Dunlo should be watched. He told the jury that Lady Dunlo had been on the stage from an early period, and he need not point out the temptations which beset her. He touched on the relations between her and Weston. Her position at that time might have excited the compassion of any one. Mr. Wertheimer at once offered her such services as she stood in need of. It had been suggested that he had not been actuated by compassion, but it was not uncharitable to think that compassion was a factor in the case. Nothing could have been more imprudent than Mr. Wertheimer taking Lady Dunlo to Trouville and Paris, and Mr. Wertheimer admitted his foolishness in the matter, but there was the evidence that they always travelled in their own names. As to the hotel book, he was bound to say that it had been displayed in a manner in which it ought not to be displayed. The evidence of the waiter who came from Trouville was, he thought, effectually disposed of in cross-examination, and he was somewhat surprised that Sir Charles Russell should have resuscitated it in his speech. The difficulty and danger of the case were that they had a glimpse into a life—a class of people—quite foreign to their ordinary experience. Miss Bilton did not conduct her life according to the usages of the society with which he and the jury were acquainted. Still there could be no doubt that persons like Mr. Marmaduke Wood were inclined to adopt certain canons of judgment with regard to the conduct of women—first of all, that all women on the music-hall stage are purchasable, and, secondly, that every woman who has had a child not in marriage is also purchasable. But he did not think this would be at all a fair construction of people's conduct. Certainly, there were many women who had had a child out of marriage who were not purchasable.

Continuing his address, Sir James Hannen said that the conduct of Wertheimer in taking and furnishing 63, Avenue-road was "extravagantly generous." He did not think the jury need trouble themselves about the motives which induced Miss Bilton to marry Lord Dunlo. She seemed to have a genuine affection for him, and her letters were letters of affection, and he found nothing in them that was of a coarse description. The marriage took place on the 10th of July, and it seemed to him clearly established that Lord "Clanricarde" (so, by a lapsus lingue, Lord Dunlo's father was described) intended to send his son abroad before the marriage. He was sent abroad accordingly, and he was bound to say that it seemed to him a very serious thing that a woman should be deprived of her husband's presence and her husband's society. Undoubtedly the joint action of Lord Clancarty and Lord Dunlo was such as to expose Lady Dunlo to temptation. On the whole, he thought her letters to her husband were frank letters, and he read extracts to show that this was the case.

As to Lady Dunlo's going to 63, Avenue-road, after her marriage, Sir James Hannen thought that any man who had a regard for her would be anxious to protect her from the attacks of a man like Weston. As to the "man-of-the-world view" which Sir Charles Russell had asked them to take, it meant one of two things—either that they should take a common-sense view of the case, or that they should take an unfavourable and cynical view of the woman. Commenting upon the evidence, Sir James pointed out that the only important thing in the testimony of the detective Clarke was the kissing, which he had an impression must have taken place. Of this there was no entry made at the time. He was not favourably impressed with Lumsden, while the evidence of Nunn did not amount to much. In regard to Mr. Marmaduke Wood, the jury had the means of measuring the value of his veracity. He was sorry to have to make an observation with reference to Lord Dunlo's conduct, which showed an utter want of appreciation of the circumstances of the case. He was, in point of fact, a mere cipher—a puppet in the hands of his father.

The jury retired to consider their verdict at five o'clock; and after less than twenty minutes' consideration found a verdict for Lady Dunlo.

CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

THE Commissioners of Calcutta have resolved to offer to the holders of the 6 per cent. Municipal loan of 1st December 1870 for Rs. 3,00,000, falling due on the 1st December next, the option of exchanging such debentures to the extent of Rs. 2,64,000 for 5 per cent. debentures of a new Municipal loan to be raised this year 1890, and having a currency of 30 years.

The rate for the exchange is fixed at a premium of Rs. 4 per cent. on the amount of the 5 per cent. debentures that may be allotted to them.

As the amount of the 5 per cent. loan available for transfer is Rs. 2,64,000 only, it will be understood that the full amount of the 6 per cent. debentures, namely, Rs. 3,00,000, cannot be exchanged.

Holders of the 6 per cent. debentures desirous of effecting transfers, should communicate their wish in a letter to reach the Secretary to the Corporation on or before the 30th September next.

Such portion of the 6 per cent. debentures, as may not be exchanged, will be repaid in cash on application on or after the 29th November 1890. Interest on these debentures will cease on the 30th November 1890.

JOHN COWIE,
Secretary to the Corporation.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him. Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

GIVE HIM A LIFT.

GIVE him a lift ! Don't kneel in prayer,
Nor moralize with his despair ;
The man is down, and his great need
Is ready help, not prayer and creed.

'Tis time when wounds are washed and healed
That the inward motive be revealed ;
But now, whatever the spirit be,
Mere words are shallow mockery.

One grain of aid just now is more
To him than tomes of saintly lore ;
Pray, if you must, within your heart,
But give him a lift, give him a start.

The world is full of good advice,
Of prayer and praise and preaching nice ;
But generous souls who aid mankind
Are like to diamonds, hard to find.

Give like a Christian, speak in deeds ;
A noble life's the best of creeds ;
And he shall wear a royal crown
Who gives a lift when men are down.

THE KING.

ONE comes to her in kingly garb and guise,
She hears the wary world his praises sing,
And listening shyly with a pleased surprise,
She owns the hope that now at last her eyes
Behold the King.

Yet still a doubt her maiden spirit grieves,
Love's perfect trust his presence fails to bring,
And in each tender romance that she weaves
Why is it that she never quite believes
He is the King ?

Another comes unnoticed and alone,
About his life no royal glammers cling ;
The world has never branded him her own,
Yet to one heart the certain truth is known
That he is King.

Now can her soul the shafts of doubt defy,
His voice from truth has caught the royal ring ;

No substitute can shine when he is by,
Disguises fall and life is grand and high,
For he is King.

GRACE S. WELLS.

A FANCY.

THE tide goes out and the tide comes in,
And gulls hang whitely about the shore,
Our ears grow used to the water's din,
And we heed the birds' quaint flight no more.

The roses bloom and the roses fade,
The green leaves wither and brown and fall ;
The brook from its old-time course has strayed,
And what does it matter, after all ?

We gather moss from the rolling waves,
Or pluck a rose that is red and rare ;
While their comrades sink into nameless graves
We lay these by with a careless care.

And so with friends that are dear and true—
We love them, ay ! with a love-like flame ;
But when they pass from our daily view,
'Tis near—ah, me ! is it quite ?—the same.

We put the thought of their love away—
A picture, flower, a ring, a book ;
We breathe a prayer that they used to pray,
And shrine in our hearts a tender look.

But redder roses shall come with spring,
Sweeter and larger than these by far ;
And new, bright mosses the waves will bring,
A fresh face shine for our beacon star.

So what does it 'count that the sun goes down,
That waves roll out, and the roses fall,
That eyelids close over smile or frown ?
Ay ! what does it 'count us, after all ?

Holloway's Pills.—Weak Stomach.—The wisest cannot enumerate one quarter of the distressing symptoms arising from imperfect or disordered digestion, all of which can be relieved by these admirable Pills. They remove cankerous taste from the mouth, flatulency and constipation. Holloway's Pills rouse the stomach, liver, and every other organ, thereby bringing digestion to that healthy tone which fully enables it to convert all we eat and drink to the nourishment of our bodies. Hence these Pills are the surest strengtheners and the safest restoratives in nervousness, wasting, and chronic debility. Holloway's Pills are infallible remedies for impaired appetite, eructations, and a multitude of other disagreeable symptoms which render the lives of thousands miserable indeed. These Pills are approved by all classes.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE Viceroy returned to Simla from his trip with fever. He has not yet been able to shake it off. By the latest accounts his Lordship is improving.

THE Commander-in-Chief has recorded a General Order on the game of polo as prejudicially affecting the welfare and efficiency of the service, basing his objections on grounds of unnecessary danger and of expense.

THE Military authorities at Fort White in the Chin country have successfully grown vegetables from seed obtained from New Zealand. English seed gave poorer results by half.

IT is reported from the Gilgit Agency that Mr. and Mrs. Littledale have crossed the Baraghil and Darkat Passes in safety and reached Gakuch vid Yassin. No English lady is said to have accomplished the journey before—an assertion not strictly true.

THE Nepal Durbar, suspecting frauds by their own officers as well as by British subjects, have ceased to permit the latter to cut and carry timber as of yore. Nepalese alone will be allowed to cut timber and sell them to British subjects. The vain fools! And should the British retaliate with a law against any Nepalese trading in India?

THE overland mail, which now leaves Bombay on Friday, and Calcutta on Tuesday, will from the fourth week of this month, depart on Saturday from that city, and on Wednesday from this. The change therefore takes place from the 24th September in Calcutta and 27th in Bombay.

WITH the lamented death of his wife, the Father of the Indian Congress has broken up his establishment, and his Scotch laird's well known "pleasance" on the heights of Jakko at Simla called Rothney Castle, is for sale. It is the finest property in Simla, and its collection of plants is magnificent.

THE P. and O. steamer Oriental lately delivered the mail from London to Hongkong in 26 days, 13½ hours—the quickest passage on record. The difficult navigation from Singapore to Hongkong was made in a few minutes more than four days, at the rate of 15 knots an hour.

EVEN the Dewan of the Maharaja of Benares is not safe from the mercenary attentions of the ruffians of that holy city. A body of these fell upon Baboo Baleswar Prasad in one of his evening drives and attacked him with lathies. Assistance coming at the nick of time, the Dewan escaped with slight injuries.

WE read :—

"It appears that there was a mutiny among the students of the Free Church College at Chinsurah, near Calcutta, lately in consequence of the dismissal of one of the native professors, whose cause they espoused. Their remonstrances, which were insolently submitted, having failed to move the Principal to restore the dismissed professor, the students of the College classes became very rowdy, threw down their books, insulted their professors and in a body walked out of their class rooms. After absenting themselves for four days they sought re-admission: but the Principal refused to re-admit the ringleaders under any circumstances, and the others only on the payment of a penalty of five rupees each.

THE Gas Manager While died suddenly at Allahabad on the 19th August and was buried. The body has now been exhumed for post mortem examination.

BOMBAY charity is proverbial, and knows no race. Mr. Pestonjee Hormusjee Cama who founded the Cama Hospital for women, has again come forward with Rs. 25,000 for medical education of Parsee, Hindu and Mahomedan women. The Bombay University will have the administration of the sum, and provide a gold medal for the best essay by a female graduate.

As the people of the "Bareilly" Raja's of whom we had occasion to speak last week, in announcing his undefined aims of undefined aggregate value, have thought fit to claim credit for the usefulness of his expenditure on the occasion of the Governor's visit as contrasted with the waste of others, we may as well remind them of a far more intelligent and truly humane use of wealth, on the same occasion, and that by a Purda lady without any pretensions to learning or experience of the outside world. We refer to Ranee Man Mohini Devi, of Pootia in the Rajshaye District, who, in honor of Sir Stuart Bayley's visit, has purposed to dig a number of wells in the District, at places where there is particular complaint for drinking water. That is at once a useful and important charity, showing both intelligence and feeling. Let the Rajas and Dewans hide their diminished heads before true woman!

To the very respectable gentlemen who have been made sick in the East by the inherent sinfulness of the natives as well as to the publicists who are always inveighing against the weakness of native juries and native magistrates, we respectfully dedicate the following singularly horrible case of murder which has just been tried at Versailles :—

"Last May an old woman named Levert was found hanging by the neck from a low branch of a tree in the forest near Saint Leu Taverny, her shoes being five yards distant, and her position almost a kneeling one. The suspicion naturally arose that she had been first strangled and then fastened to the branch to make believe she had committed suicide. It was thought that her son, Emile Levert, was the most likely person to have committed the murder. His mother was a peasant proprietor, and a widow. When he was about to be married five years ago, she made over all her property to him and a daughter living in Paris, in return for a small annuity. Soon after she signed the deed the son said he could not pay his share of the annuity, but was willing to let her have the run of the house. Her health broke down, and, as she could not work, he insisted on her paying for her keep out of what his sister allowed her. This she refused to do. From that time she was beaten and starved. Twice the neighbours rescued her, and denounced him, and he was condemned to terms of imprisonment. When charged with the murder he began by denying it, and on being driven into a corner said that his mother one day lost her head and threatened to kill him with a reaping hook. In his rage he threw a rope round her neck, strangled her, and then took her corpse in a wheelbarrow to hang it from a branch in the forest. He afterwards said that his mother was an old miser. She could not work, and she refused to pay for the food she ate. Levert's counsel pleaded that if the mother could rise from the grave and come into that court she would implore indulgence for her son. The best way to avenge the crime would be to leave the accused to the stings of remorse which, if his life were spared and he condemned to the solitude and silence of the gaol, must for ever assail him. The jury took this view, and pronounced a verdict of guilty, with extenuating circumstances."

No wonder, juries are at a discount in Europe.

By order of the Governor-General in Council the following rules have been substituted for Article 506 of the Civil Service Regulations. The Bombay Government had pointed out that that Article was inconsistent with Rule 6, section 110, of the Civil Pension Code, 6th Edition. While the Rule empowered officers named therein to pass final orders as to both retention in service and retirement of certain classes of subordinates after attainment of the age of 55 years, the Article permitted delegation of authority in cases of retention only :—

"The Local Government may delegate to heads of Departments or to officers not under the rank of Collectors or District Judges—

(1) The power of declaring any non-gazetted subordinate to be inefficient, and permitting him to remain in the service, provided he continues to be efficient, for a definite period up to, but not beyond, the age of 60 years.

(2) Subject to such conditions as the Local Government may think fit, the power of declaring any non-gazetted subordinate to be inefficient, and compelling him to retire either at the age of 55 years, or on the expiry of any further period up to which his service has been extended, or before the expiry of such further period if he ceases to be efficient.

Each such subordinate's case must be taken up when he is 55 years old and on the expiry of each extension of service."

The Government of India have delegated the powers of a Local Government to the following officers :—

(i) The Director-General of the Post Office of India in respect of all officers subordinate to him ;

(ii) the Comptroller and Auditor-General in respect of all non-gazetted officers subordinate to him ;

(iii) the Inspector-General of Military Works, the Director-General of Telegraphs, and the Director-General of Railways in respect of all subordinates serving under them, except Accountants ;

(iv) the Accountant-General in the Public Works Department in respect of all subordinates serving under him, including all Accountants belonging to the establishment under the Government of India.

AN experimental treatment of rinderpest in Madras with solid cinchona febrifuge, shews that the drug reduces the temperature in the first stages and that it ceases to act in an advanced stage. The inspector of cattle diseases reports that of twenty two cattle, fifteen recovered, one was relieved and six died.

At a time when grave complaints like albuminuria and Diabetes are becoming frequent in India, we deem it advisable to reproduce, from our collections of a few years back, the following giving probably the only satisfactory mode of treatment :—

"Since we know not at present any drug that possesses therapeutic value to any marked extent in this terrible and fatal (Bright's) disease, and since it is daily making sad havoc among human beings, and principally among that class who, by reason of their valuable public labours, are particularly necessary to the welfare of the world, therefore, it becomes a medical question of paramount interest that we should discover some potent method of combating this very prevalent disease. Some years since Carel first called attention to the treatment of Bright's disease by the use of a milk diet, and since then Duncan, as well as many other prominent physicians, has written on this subject.

We have ourselves seen some remarkable results follow this treatment, while Dr. S. Weir Mitchell, of our city, is now quite an enthusiast on this subject. This method of treating a formidable disease has received sufficient distinguished indorsement to recommend it seriously to our notice. We would, therefore, ask all physicians who read this article to try this method of treatment and to furnish us with their experiences, which we will publish. The milk is used thoroughly skimmed and entirely freed from butter. To procure the best results, it has been advised that the patient shall restrict himself absolutely to milk and continue the treatment for a long time. If it disagrees with the stomach (as it will in some cases), Dr. Mitchell advises that the patient be put to bed and the treatment commenced with tablespoonful doses, to which lime water is added, until the stomach tolerates the milk, when from eight to ten pints daily should be taken, and absolutely nothing else. The sanction of such a distinguished physician as Dr. Mitchell forces us to seriously consider the merits of this treatment, and we trust to receive the experience of all readers of this journal who may have cases of Bright's disease to treat."—Med. and Surg. Reporter. (U. S.)

We may add that we have seen, at Agartala, Baboo Doyal Chand Banejee, now of 135-6 Cornwallis Street, treat an advanced case of Diabetes completely cured by medicine and an exclusively skimmed milk diet.

ANTHRAX is reported in the Viceroy's stables at Dehra Dun. Six horses were attacked, and three of them have died including Lord William Bressford's Arab pony Shamshad.

As regards the offices of the Government of India, the Calcutta session begins from 1st November next.

THE next Calcutta University Examinations in Arts and Law will begin—the Entrance on Monday the 2nd February, the F. A. and B. A. on Monday the 16th February and the B. L. on Monday the 2nd March, 1891.

WE see the Pioneer has extracted our notice of the death of young Moutague Bradford. It is a distinguished honour—the Blue Ribbon of the Indian Press. But we dare not enjoy the felicity. Some fine morning we may see the great Editor excuse himself from having been tempted to the weakness of recognising anything quotable in a Baboo publication.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE parting of the two Emperors at Peterhoff was not friendly. The Kaiser, it is said, left abruptly as the Czar refused to allow him to attend the coming military manœuvres in the South.

DISASTROUS floods have occurred in various parts of Austria. The Danube overflowed its banks, entering the valley of the Moldau. The dam of a lake near Prague burst and swelled the Moldau, causing the collapse of the famous old bridge over the Moldau and drowning thirty persons. Vienna, Buda Pesth, Prague and Presburg are partially submerged. Prague is threatened most. Portions of it are already surrounded by raging torrents and the utmost alarm is felt.

A CROWDED meeting of Socialists at Berlin resulted in a collision with the Police.

THERE is coolness between France and Italy. A French squadron was ordered to Spezia to salute King Humbert during the launch of an Italian ironclad. There was a difference as to the formalities to be observed resulting in the withdrawal of the order for despatch of the squadron. King Humbert resented it and declined to go to Spezia.

THE month opened at Liverpool with a Congress of the Trades Unions. The delegates represented one million and five hundred thousand members. No movement is now complete without ladies and many of the fair sex added to the significance of the meeting. The Congress adopted a resolution of sympathy with the Australian strikers, appealing to all Unions for funds in aid of the greatest labour revolt. The president was of opinion that the time had come to urge upon Parliament an eight hours' working day Bill. He favored the State control of railways and direct Parliamentary representation of labour. According to him, Nationalisation was the only solution of the land question. That view, however, the Congress would not accept, and rejected the proposition for its inclusion in the Parliamentary Programme. As good as their word, the Unions are collecting funds for Australia. There is also a counter-movement of Shipowners. At a meeting in London representing one hundred millions capital, they have passed a resolution for the federation of the shipping trade of the British Empire to deal with the labour question and to resist the tyranny of the Trades Unions. The meeting promised its support to the Australian shippers. At Sydney too they have formed an Australian Employers' Defence Union.

The latest news from Australia is that the strike and blockade at Brisbane have collapsed. Steamers have been despatched with black-leg crews, and blackleg dock labourers have been permanently engaged.

Nothing comes amiss in this world. There is a time for everything and every dog has his day. Thus the black legs of the Colonies have turned to splendid use. They could not have done more service to their country and the world if they had always been the most well-conducted fellows on earth. Their very number which had hitherto been an embarrassment to society and administration, is all the more welcome at this crisis.

THE Congress of Agriculture and Forestry opened at Vienna on the 1st, with six hundred delegates.

THE Baronetcy of Sir Dinshaw Maneckjee Petit has been announced in the London Gazette. On his death, the dignity passes on to his second son.

ON the plea of communicating a secret, a young man named Scandimiroff advanced to the Governor of Novgorod and presented a revolver at him, who, equal to the occasion, at once closed and wrestled with the assailant. In the scuffle the revolver went off, the bullet entering the ground. Scandimiroff was secured.

TO escape banishment, Moussa Bey fled on the 29th August to Mecca. He has been arrested at Sivas.

IT is telegraphed from Washington that the Senate has reduced the duties on flax and cotton bagging. The news from Russia, however, is that in proportion to the rise in the exchange, the customs duties have been raised twenty per cent.

SPEAKING at the Cutlers' Feast at Sheffield on the 4th, Lord Cross spoke of the enormous strides India was making and said that Government was doing its utmost to increase the railways in India.

THE Emperor William, on the 3rd, reviewed the German Fleet at Kiel. The Austrian squadron was present and Admiral Hornby represented the British Government. The proceedings passed off brilliantly.

THE rumour has been revived that the Czar will visit the Sultan in October.

IN view of the growing estrangement between the two principal sects in India, the Hindu Ranjika suggests the formation of a National Association, having for its object the restoration of good feelings between the Hindus and Mahomedans. Thereupon, our native contemporaries all exclaim, this is a very good suggestion. We regret to be unable to join them. There seems to be a mania for associations and public meetings. What can associations and meetings do in such a case? Let our Hindu brethren cultivate good feeling towards the Mahomedans, instead of holding solemn conclaves, making declamatory speeches, and passing hollow resolutions.

MR. Bradlaugh has at least in one instance saved the honour of the British name. Not long ago he asked whether one of the guerilla leaders of Burma, having surrendered on a promise of his life, had nevertheless been tried and sentenced to capital punishment. The Viceroy, on being communicated with, telegraphed the suspension of the execution. The case was then brought in appeal before the Judicial Commissioner, Upper Burma, who has now commuted the sentence of death passed by the Sessions Judge of Myingyan on Boh Yan Yun and others, to one of transportation for life.

To this day the enlightened and strong régime which has displaced the "unspeakable" Thebaw's barbarous and weak administration has not been able to secure tolerable protection to the inhabitants of the very capital. Robbery of all kinds is of almost daily occurrence. Matters have reached such an intolerable pass that the tradesmen and other residents of Mandalay are about to wait in a body on the Chief Commissioner to represent their grievance. The Police is evidently inadequate in number, or miserably deficient in energy and resource. If matters are anything so bad, the Local Government is much to blame. The subject is of more than ordinary importance. The civil security or insecurity of the capital of the late kingdom indirectly—almost directly—influences the final settlement of the newly acquired territory. Thus the question is not unworthy the prompt attention of the Supreme Government. A quiet and courteous filip from Simla to Rangoon would be a proper exercise of the viceregal function of general supervision. As for the poor subjects of the deposed majesty of Burma, they must be unlucky indeed if, deprived of their national throne, they do not obtain the protection which is the boast of British administration.

THEY have struck what is said to be a very rich gold-bearing reef in Chota Nagpore—rich even for Australia—and the "find" threatens to raise disputes between the Sonapet and Chota Nagpore Companies, unless an amicable arrangement is come to. The Sonapet are holders of lands on both banks of the head waters of the Son river, while the Chota Nagpore are proprietors of all the surrounding lands, and claim that the reef has been struck on their property. The Sonapet, on the contrary, assert that it runs for miles through their lands, so that the point of discovery is not of so much importance as the definition of the boundary.

Whatever may be the character of this discovery, or at least the ultimate value of it, it has as usual roused the frenzy for gold. There is a fever of speculation. Companies are starting up every day and the shares of some have already gone up to fabulous lengths. Everybody knows it can not last. No matter, sufficient for the hour is the gain and glory thereof!

ONE of the complaints of the Civil and Military Gazette against the Nawabate of Bahawalpur recently was the undue influence of the foreign element in the personnel of the immediate advisers of the ruler. It is now glad to report that "something has been done to reduce the friction and tension caused, as we noticed, in the administration of the Bahawalpur State by the employment of outsiders, who have no real stake in the welfare of the State, and are bent only on self-aggrandisement. Further elimination of the foreign element would doubtless be beneficial to the State, which is a purely Mahomedan one, both in government and population, and the race is naturally intolerant of the outsiders of other religions."

This spirit of exclusiveness has been carried to the extent of prohibiting, by beat of drum, Hindus—men and women—from joining the procession of the Mohurram tazias. Divide and rule is the latest state craft in British India, and the precedent is being drafted into the native states.

IN July last, we noticed a contempt of Court case in which the Chief Justice of Ceylon fined a Magistrate for presuming to order arrest of a horse yoked to the Chief Justice's carriage standing in the Court premises, it being the subject of a charge for theft. The Magistrate was fined £10, and the complainant £5, the arresting Police inspector being let off with a severe reprimand. Another new interpretation has been given to the phrase contempt of contempt in the same fruitful island by a Puisne Justice. It seems that that offence is not there limited to disrespect to Judges and for their belongings. Even Court officers of whatever degree are a Court and are privileged against any trifling of the kind. For instance, Mr. S. T. Muttiah was summoned to serve as a juror. Lest his business suffer, he wanted to be saved from the service of a juror, and took the illegal course of visiting the wife of the Deputy Fiscal and attempting to induce her by offers of money to speak in his favor to her husband, and then requesting the Deputy Fiscal himself to get him exempted. This was construed a contempt of Court and Muttiah was hauled up to answer the charge. What followed will appear from the order of the Hon. H. Dias, Junior Puisne Justice. Addressing Mr. Muttiah, he said:—

"I think you have been very properly advised in not denying the facts referred to in the affidavits, as it would have been almost madness on your part to contradict the statements of three such respectable witnesses. You have been charged with contempt of a more aggravated character than contempts usually are, that is to say, that you, by means of a bribe, attempted to tamper with an officer of this Court in the exercise of his duty; and that duty was not a common duty but an extraordinary one connected with the administration of justice. It is quite clear that, at the time you went to the Deputy-Fiscal's house, you do not seem to have been so irresponsible as you would wish to make out by your statement; but I am willing to accept your statement that you were not in a proper state of mind—that is the least expression I can use. However according to the facts set out in the affidavits, you could not have been so utterly irresponsible. You went to Mr. Driberg's house, one of the officers of this Court with a bundle of notes in your hands; you met his wife and son, and exhibited a bundle of notes apparently and undoubtedly for the purpose of tempting them to accept the notes. You seem to have miscalculated in the matter, and the intended present was rejected. Offences of this kind in other countries, in fact in all countries where the law is administered by a proper set of officers—and interference with courts of justice—are looked upon as one of the most heinous offences, and in this case you tried by tampering with the Deputy Fiscal to induce him to abuse the process of the Court. I need not make any further remarks with reference to your conduct on the occasion in question. You are a sensible man, and a man of the world, and you must feel satisfied that you have committed an act which will stamp you with a character which is not enviable, but in view of the apology offered by you, and in view of the sensible words addressed to me by your counsel, I am not prepared to inflict a heavy punishment; but the law must be vindicated both where a rich man as well as a poor man is concerned. You seem to have trusted to an abundance of wealth to attain your object. I must express the sense of the Court with regard to conduct of this kind by the punishment I am about to inflict on you. At first I considered the case so serious that I had made up my mind to send you to jail; but in view of the apology offered and in consideration of your defence that you were not, at the time, in a proper state of mind, I am prepared to simply fine you, and I accordingly impose on you a fine of Rs. 200, and until that fine is paid you will be detained."

His Lordship may be, and doubtless is, technically right, but this is our thinking is stretching the point too far.

IN reply to an address presented at Poona to the Governor of Bombay by the Local Branch of the National Indian Association, Lord Harris made a neat little speech signifying nothing beyond appreciation of the compliment. He happened to refer to the facilities offered in these days to the native of India to make the acquaintance of the British at home, "amongst native fogs, and judge for himself whether there is much difference." This affords our clever contemporary of the Rast Goftar a fine opportunity to moralise on the subject. Says the writer:—

"There cannot, of course, be any fundamental difference in the nature of the two, but the nature undergoes a great change when the Englishman has come to India and settled here. He comes here with ideas more or less romantic of the East, with kindly sympathies for the natives of these climates and anxious to cultivate their acquaintance. But a change is gradually wrought over his nature and this is mainly due to the environments by which he is surrounded. His sympathy wears off by degrees. There is ample and undoubted warrant for his race pride and race superiority. But we do not know if that affords sufficient justification for his looking down upon all natives without any distinction. The glamour of romance and sentiment is gone, after the Englishman has been here for some time, and the actualities with which he is confronted, mingled with his own little prejudices, make a cold, unsympathetic, exclusive man of him. He knows nothing, and cares little to know anything, of the people of strange manners and customs whom he daily sees around him. This attitude engenders in both races a mutual distrust, misunderstanding and enmity which it is the aim of the National Indian Association to remove."

That puts the best face upon the matter, but it is more philosophical than real. There is no disenchantment in the matter at all. The romance of the East is the romance of the pagoda tree, pegs, pillaws, hot curries, chutnies, sherbets, dancing girls and so forth, and it exists to this day in all its barbaric splendour and its enough of pristine profusion; only for pagodas the old tree now yields rupees, for Claret and Port and Shiraz there is Champagne and Hungarian and Greek wines, while the eating and relishes are as glorious as ever, and the sherbets more refreshing being now cooled with ice, and if the Hindu-stani ballet is not so much patronized that is because the Naiads of the Danube are preferred. But does the stranger "come with kindly sympathy for the natives of this climate and anxious to cultivate their acquaintance?" We much doubt. In fact we know, we may say.

THE Bengal Government has limited the use of liveries for messengers for the Calcutta offices to the Bengal Secretariat in all its branches; the Board of Revenue; the offices of the Director of Public Instruction, Inspector-General of Jails, Inspector-General of Registration, Inspector-General of Hospitals, Sanitary Commissioner, Director of the Department of Land Records and Agriculture and Provincial Superintendent of Census. The peons in personal attendance on the Excise Commissioner will also have his livery. The costs are not to exceed Rs. 50, 30 and 20 for Jemadars, head peons and peons. The hardest restriction, we believe, is that no expenditure should in future be incurred on liveries in any office from contract contingencies. Jemadars and peons in attendance on the Secretaries and Under-Secretaries to Government, the duffries and peons who go on duty with the Secretariat to Darjeeling and the peons on attendance on the Heads of Departments who are authorized to accompany the Government to Darjeeling are entitled to their liveries annually, others every alternate year.

THE Political Pandit to the Government has made a new departure. He is certainly not the man to accept martyrdom if it can be helped. After having done as much as lay in him to abolish the great Hindu festival of the Doorga Pooja and earned, on the one hand, a reputation with Europeans for liberality and freedom from prejudice and, on the other, the execration of his own community, he might well think it time to humour his people and recover caste. He has now made his prayaschit, but with his usual lack of judgment. He has gone from one extreme to the other. He has outorthodoxed the most orthodox. He has done an act at which the most illiberal Pandit of the backwoods of Bancoora would in these days hold his breath. If the act belonged to his personal sphere he might please himself, though at the expense of public derision. But it concerns his public life and hence all the more marvel, and all the less excuse. It is as an official, or at least as a servant of the general public, that he has aired his newborn zeal for orthodoxy. It appears that as Secretary to the Hindu Hostel he refused to admit a bania (subarnabanik) student into the house on the ground of his low caste! Here is a grand Manu redivivus! Here is a fine pose for the Pandit who has already been pushed to a corner by his brother Pandits in the country for his endeavours to take the Tagores quietly back to caste! Yes, we dare say the purity of his Hostel would not be affected by the presence of Pir Alis! But a bania is abomination. Don't the Banias give any presents to Pandits? Did not Baboo Bholanath Mullick call Nyayaratna to preside at the distribution of gifts on the Singhabahini Pooja or on the occasion of his own weightment against gold and gems? This is Hinduism with a vengeance. We have been simply amazed—the whole town is amazed. But it will never do. At this day it is ridiculous. There is no objection to Hindus of different classes to read in the same school and the same class, sitting on the same bench closely packed. Why should not they be permitted into the same hostel? Surely, living in a common hostel does not necessitate eating together.

IN another part is an account of the Moharram at Moorshedabad and the disturbances which have thrown that city into a ferment. Our correspondent writes with the impartiality of a Hindu and the knowledge of a Moorshedabadite. We have pointed out one mistake he incidentally falls into. We will here notice one omission in his account of the occasions on which the peace of the Moharram was broken or threatened. In 1864 when we were in charge of the Nawab Nazim's affairs, a well known Mahomedan muktear of Lal Bagh attempted to disturb the Nizamat procession in His Highness' presence and in sight of the civil head-quarters. Being repulsed, he revenged himself by complaining before the city magistracy against the heads of the party from the Palace. Mr. Hosmer spared the Nawab Nazim but gave summonses against the Nawab's Nazir and the favorite Haquim. There was a burst at once of indignation and alarm in the killa and His Highness directed us to save his izzat and the integrity of his faith at any cost. His favorite Haquim Abul Hossein and his Eunuchs must not even appear in court, and gave us the carte blanche to spend a lac of Rupees or more if necessary! We were to import Attorneys and pleaders and barristers fetched from Calcutta. We did nothing of the kind, but managed with a single pleader from Berhampore. In fact, Mr. Hosmer himself managed it. His Highness' faith and izzat were saved and all the rest of it far too cheaply for our credit.

On the eve of retirement from the Western Presidency of the eminent Professor Wordsworth, a suggestion has been started for the local University to grant him the honorary degree of LL. D. The Indian Spectator will none of it. He is, in our contemporary's opinion, far above such honorary titles. Nor will a Bombay degree—even that of Doctor of Laws of both kinds—be any great honor to him, though it might be to an inferior man. Our contemporary writes with genuine sympathy and with great force:—

"We, for one, cannot see what service could deserve more to be honoured and rewarded than that of one that has for a quarter of a century been an example to the young men of this generation of all that is noble and just; that 'uttered nothing base'; that has ever come forward from his retirement to fight the battle of truth when its interests were in jeopardy; that has been, in fact, to the educated young men of the present generation a pattern of all moral worth, of gentlemanliness and gentleness. Learning will he always admired. But in the form in which he presented it to the view it has had a charming, endearing presence. We remember the impressions created by Sir Alexander Grant, and by Dr. Haikness on their pupils. There is no doubt of the learning of the former of these, especially. But from the nobility of his life there hangs a charm round the name of the present Principal, to which his predecessors can lay no claim. It is something to have inspired with noble thoughts a whole generation of students, to have taught them, by his unostentatious example, to shun what is mean and base and untruthful. Lawgivers seldom succeed so well as one that imprints a law on the heart from the record of his own simple life. Such a one, the like of whom appears once in a century here, is fit for something more dignified than honorary distinctions or decorations."

That is all very true. Yet we do not see why the degree should not become the learned Professor. It would be more appropriate than a knighthood. Indeed, there should be no appearance of passing him over by the University. He would prize it as a memento of his connection. After all, not for him but for the honour of the University and the cause of learning in India, should the degree be conferred on him with all imaginable pomp and circumstance. No such opportunity should be lost for permanently connecting the name of Wordsworth with an Indian University.

THE Maharaja of Cooch Behar's loyalty to the British Government and to Europeans is well known. He has impoverished his State in pursuit of it. And yet when, having exhausted his resources, he comes to his patrons and friends for what is no great favour, and in the cause of that easy access to his territory, a cause which is as much theirs as his—in behalf of a public work which is mutually beneficial to the Paramount State and the Principality—he is snubbed for his pains and treated worse than was poor Dhulip Singh himself. His Highness asked from the Government of Bengal a loan of five lacs only for the proposed Cooch Behar State Railway, on the securities of the Chucklajet estate—his hereditary property in British territory. But the terms demanded by our Government, it is said, were such that the Maharaja could not make up his mind to submit to them. His Highness must be deeply disappointed. This ought to be a lesson to the Maharaja, however. God grant that he may henceforth learn to rely on himself. He should pay greater attention to his own finances, and we trust the Maharani will assist her consort in setting their house in order.

AN Englishman signing "B. C. S." in the Indian Mirror, whose letter of indignation against the people of this country for their neglect of the memory of the late Robert Knight we see reproduced in the Statesman, has taken unnecessary, not to say unaccountable, offence at a single expression in a back number of Reis and Rayyet. We thought we wrote with sufficient care. Writing of the dead, we have cause to write with care, knowing that though ghosts might not care to pay us a visit there were living spirits enough around us, far and near, even in our neighbourhood, prowling for an opportunity, by themselves or other nearer diabolical agency, to fall down on us. In explanation of our own conduct why we did not start a Knight Memorial Fund when asked after the indifference of others, we said that we were afraid of injuring the cause by rousing the jealousy of members of our own community, and therefore referred our kind friends to the Editor of the only native daily, the Mirror (a long established journal by the way), as the better man to take the lead. We thought nobody could possibly fasten a quarrel on us on that paragraph. How mistaken! Some people are up to any feat. Here is a member of the Bengal Civil Service—for B. C. S. is either that or Bill Collecting Sircar—in high dudgeon with us. He has fired off a long and scathing paragraph at us. It so appears that in referring to our "petty jealousies" we dropped a passing suggestion by way of explanation of the phenomenon. That suggestion was "foreign domination," and that has stuck in the British throat. It would certainly have been more pleasant to B. C. S. if we had attributed our weakness to our innate baseness. He takes us to task for this outrageous sentiment and does not hesitate to class us with that large section of the local press which practises the peculiarly British precept, namely—any stick is good enough to beat a dog or a native; and practises it with such success as to seize the said stick and use it against the British lion himself—a section "with which it is common to ascribe all the ills which afflict Indian humanity to English rule, and to show a convenient oblivion of the countless benefits, which this country derives from its connection with the Empire of Great Britain." So it has come to this, that we are among the scurillous and seditious journals! All our independent support of the British Government—all our moderation and discrimination—have gone for nothing! And this writer is voluble on the subject of gratitude. He lashes our countrymen for their ingratitude. He loftily descants on the virtue and, of course, claims a full measure of it for his countrymen. "Let me assure your readers," he loftily proclaims, "Let me assure your readers that all Englishmen, worthy of the name, have a wholesome respect for gratitude, and a proportionate abhorrence of the converse." Well, in any case, it is easier to preach than to practise. The injustice done by this writer to us is so gross as to destroy all his claim to authority. If ever journal in the world has suffered in any cause, Reis & Rayyet is that paper. If the malcontent section of the Indian press is so large, it is because malcontent pays so well. In the discharge of our duty as public journalists, we have never been allured by that payment. Nor did we expect the Europeans of our generation who live in flats like rabbits in a warren and use dogcarts for conveyance and maintain a single hideous landau for equipage of ceremony or state, to make good our loss. But surely we were entitled to common fairness. What a commentary does B. C. S.'s own treatment of this journal supply to his voluble discourse on gratitude! Nor is he the only quarter of which we have to complain. Could there be a worse case of ingratitude than the letter of Senior Chaplain Welbore Macarthy on which we commented last week? The holy man abused us like a—saint and prophet for our very fondness towards one of his own people.

REIS & RAYYET.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 6, 1890.

THE FLOODS AND THE DISTRESS.

THE floods in the present year are as bad as ever—in some places even unprecedented. By the failure of the great Laltakuri and Rampal bunds, all Moorshedabad and Nuddea are under water. There is extensive distress, but we are happy to observe that, on a prompt appeal from the Missionaries, subscriptions are being collected and relief measures organised to mitigate the distress. The Government officers are also on the alert, and the District Magistrate is taking steps to ascertain the extent of the distress and to apply the needful remedies. The floods in other districts have also more or less damaged the crops on low lands. From the official summary for the week ending the 30th August last, published in the Calcutta Gazette, it appears that, in addition to the district of Nuddea, injury has been done to the crops by excessive rain in Khulna and Satkhira, while the extent of the loss in Bongong, Jhenida and Magura caused by floods is great. The aus crop in the greater part of Bongong has been destroyed. In Moorshedabad, the destruction of both aus and amun in all the lower tracts is considerable, and the people are much inconvenienced by inundation. According to the official summaries, there is not much distress in this district yet. In Rajshahye, the flood is higher than usual and some injury has been done to the aus which could not be cut earlier, while haimanti paddy on low lands has also been submerged, but the outlook is yet good if the flood subsides soon. In Pubna, the crops on low lands are lost. The aus and jute have suffered from the rapid rise of the rivers in Dacca, and fodder is becoming scarce. There is partial damage also in Furreedpore and Backergunge. The rainfall in Perozpur in the latter district was heavy, and the official estimate of the outturn of crops is 12 annas. Standing crops, though partially damaged, are yet fairly promising. Amun seedlings are also damaged, but new sowings have done well. An average crop is expected. The floods in Tipperah are considerable, but there is no serious damage to crops as yet. In Behar, with the exception of a few tracts, the prospect is not good. The Bhadoi crop is almost a total failure in Sarun, while in Mozufferpore, although the condition of the rice crop is satisfactory, the floods have damaged the crop in low lands. At the best, a 6 to 8 annas crop is all that is excepted in this district. The prospect is better in Durbhanga, though the inundation has not altogether spared the district. As regards the distress in Sarun, the Lieutenant-Governor has expressed his approval of the arrangements already made by Mr. Bourdillon for the organisation of relief in the town of Chupra. For the rest of the district, His Honor recommends prompt measures, saying:—

"In the interior it would appear from the eagerness with which grain sent from Chupra by boat was purchased that there is real distress, which all residents will not be able to provide for by buying grain. The Lieutenant-Governor is, moreover, inclined to doubt whether the mahajans will advance to all rayyets, now that the usual security has disappeared with the loss of the crop on the ground, and also whether all labourers will be supported, as the best of them will doubtless be, by their usual employers. It seems desirable to establish a village agency for ascertaining the facts, and administering relief where necessary; also for co-operating with the officers whom the Collector proposes to depute to examine applications for loans. These may be freely given, where required, up to the amount of the Government grant for the purpose, and the proceeds may without objection be applied to the support of the rayyets, and their cattle. Very small loans may occasionally be made to labourers, on such security as they can offer. The result of the enquiries made by the village agency will indicate how far gratuitous relief is needed; where required it should not be withheld."

The damage from rain and floods in the Bhagulpore Division if not general, appears to be severe in the Supal sub-division and in parts of Maldah. The makai is reported to be a complete failure in parts of the Sonthal Pergunnahs. In Orissa, particularly the Bhudrak sub-division, crops have suffered from insufficient rainfall, and the extent of the distress may be conceived from the fact that 36 relief works had to be taken in hand. Damage has also been done in the Chota Nagpore Division to the Bhadoi crops in Hazaribagh from excessive rain.

The above is the official estimate of the condition of the crops. Private accounts of the distress caused by the floods in the Eastern Bengal Districts are naturally of a more serious character. It is true popular impressions on such subjects are apt to be exaggerated. Unfortunately, official narratives are not to be implicitly received. Europeans fail to see aright from defect of sympathy and from ignorance of the conditions of existence of a poor Asiatic population, while Natives take their cue from their superiors. To us the official accounts from the East appear very unsatisfactory. Native servants of Government rooted out and swept away from their stations tell a dismal tale. In Northern Tipperah and the neighbouring parts, the cattle have been simply washed away. There is cry for help from all sides, and great are the sufferings of men thrown out of their homes by the inundation. Relief measures on an adequate scale will be promptly provided, particularly for those who have lost their all by these floods—their crops as well as homesteads.

MR. ALEXANDER MACKENZIE AS AN EDUCATIONIST.

THE Central Provinces are to be congratulated upon the record of their educational progress. They have struck out a new line and succeeded. Technical education has found a congenial soil and taken root. Under the watchful and sympathetic care of the Chief Commissioner, approved methods of education have met with an encouragement here which is unknown in other parts of the country generally. Mr. Mackenzie had lately an occasion of referring to the work achieved in this direction during the last three years of his administration, and well might he feel proud of that work. It is an honor to his province also to practically head the movement for technical education. It has achieved no mean distinction in having successfully carried out reforms which have yet scarcely emerged from the stage of "talk" elsewhere. With Mr. Mackenzie's pronounced opinions on the subject, our readers must be thoroughly familiar. When those opinions were formally set forth three years ago, in connection with his proposals for the conversion of the Morris College into an institution for Technical instruction, we were obliged to express a strong dissent. While thoroughly realising the great need in these times, for some thorough measures for the encouragement of practical education, we were not prepared for the too drastic scheme of Mr. Mackenzie. We thought his zeal had led him to make a proposal which stood small chance of acceptance from the general public. And we were not mistaken in our anticipations. The suggestion for the abandonment of the Morris College as a College in Arts was received with vehement opposition, and eventually it had to be abandoned. Mr. Mackenzie, however, is still of opinion that it would have been the best thing to adopt the course he recommended but, though he was obliged to give it up, he has not been inactive in promoting the cause he has had so much at heart. With such limited funds as were available, he has, with the cordial co-operation of his Education Department, succeeded in placing Technical education in his territory on a satisfactory footing of efficiency, and his success in this important work ought to stimulate the efforts of other Provincial Governments. His strong determination to advance useful education has removed all difficulties, and the Central Provinces now stand in the enviable position of leading the way in a field of reform in which more favored territories must follow its brilliant example.

The arrangements for the teaching of drawing are not only in a satisfactory state of advance in Colleges, Middle Schools and Normal Schools, but a beginning has already been made in the Primary Schools. Drawing is no doubt, as Mr. Mackenzie says, at the root of all technical education and of especial importance for our youths in bringing their minds in contact with things and not merely with words. It is indeed very gratifying to be told that a greater percentage of lads in these provinces show an aptitude for drawing than is generally met with in English schools. This is no doubt a most encouraging circumstance, justifying Mr. Mackenzie in indulging in the hope that, with the fostering care of his successors and the provision of a steadily advanced technical instruction, the Central Provinces may prove the cradle of a new and better school of Hindu artists and architects.

The steps taken for introducing the Kindergarten system into infant classes, and for recognizing the carpentry classes, also promise to be attended with important results. Mr. Mackenzie speaks with great approval of the improved system of carpentry instruction which is described as follows:—

"The Carpentry Classes, which are I think peculiar to these Provinces, have now been reorganised on the Slojd system as modified by Mr. Ricks of the London School Board. They will no longer attempt to teach carpentry as a trade, but will take up the 'hand and eye training' where the Kindergarten system leaves it: and teach the pupils a manual dexterity which may be turned to account in a score of ways after they leave school. 'The principal occupations' (says the Inspector-General, in describing the system) 'are wood-work and modelling in clay and in card-board. The occupations are based on drawing. Every student is required to draw to scale plans of the models to be made, and then to make the models from the drawings. The exercises are progressive. The first exercises in wood-work are done with a knife, and when the student has learnt to cut accurately with that instrument, he is taught the use of tools.' Nothing could be better than this for native lads—and I anticipate great popularity for these classes. I hope to see one attached to every Middle school at least."

Nagpur already boasts of an Agricultural School with a sufficiently comprehensive curriculum of studies, and arrangements are also in contemplation for attaching an agricultural class for teachers to this institution. Provision for the teaching of Physical Science is likewise being advanced by the appointment of itinerant instructors for the teachers of primary schools, by the supply of apparatus, and by the establishment of scholarships. Indeed, there is unmistakable progress in every branch of technical instruction from the highest, such as Law and Engineering, to elementary instruction in the Primary Schools. The Normal Schools have been remodelled, and even drill and gymnastics are now placed under better methods.

The concluding portion of Mr. Mackenzie's speech is a vigorous re-statement of his educational policy. We extract it with pleasure for our readers:—

"The improvement of the Colleges and High Schools must depend entirely upon the action of the Universities. I have only been able in their case to introduce drawing as an optional subject and such an amount of physical science as the University consents to recognise. I must again express my own conviction that the dominating influence of those great bodies has not yet been sufficiently diverted into the channels which would be most beneficial to the country at this stage of its progress. At the outset, when the task was merely to give a general stimulus to Western studies, and to equip the public service and the learned professions with an English-speaking personnel, a purely literary education may have been sufficient. But surely it is high time now that the Universities should recognise that what India wants at the present day is industrial and commercial development, and should shape their requirements so as to give due scope for, nay rather should insist upon, the teaching in High Schools and Colleges of something more than a purely literary curriculum (grudgingly supplemented of late by a bare modicum of physical science, and by the establishment of an alternative (B) course which the majority of affiliated institutions appear carefully to avoid.) The Universities in India ought to perform the function of directing and stimulating High Education of all sorts, and ought to fill the place taken in England by South Kensington, the School of Mines, the Owen College and other Institutions of technical training. I say the present policy of the Universities is not only narrow, but is in fact positively mischievous in its results. I am no enemy of culture, no advocate for teaching only bread and butter ciences. But can any one pretend that the Indian Universities do turn out men of culture? and is not the one idea which their alumni have to secure 'bread and butter' or its Oriental equivalent? What has been the effect up to date of cramming our undergraduates with English poetry and classic prose? of stuffing them with metaphysics and a mutilated system of ethics? We have few native 'captains of labour,' but hundreds of voluble pleaders and platform orators. We see all the great industries of the country for the most part in English hands and carried on with English capital, while our graduates are either starving at an over-crowded Bar or besieging the steps of Government offices. They have schemes by the score for reforming the Empire, but no idea of exploiting and developing its resources. Let us by all means have a good native Bar. An institution which can boast such names as Telang in Bombay, or Romesh Chunder Mitter in Calcutta, and, let me add, as Bipin Krishna Bose in Nagpur, stands in no need of apologist or defender. But surely the Bar is not the only profession outside Government service to which our young men should be shut up. Yet practically this is so at the present time, and the result is that we see the country overrun with half-educated self-styled reformers, who having little of that general knowledge which makes the perfect advocate, find themselves with no prospects at the Bar, and accordingly turn from the Cutcherry to the platform, substitute the newly discovered trade of Delegate for that of Pleader, and inundate the public with torrents of mischievous and frothy declamation. Just as badly digested food evolves flatulence in the stomach, so the badly digested cram of our High Schools and Colleges produces gas on the brain; and for this very prevalent malady in India I fear the University system is to blame. My views may seem to many Philistine, or heterodox, or exaggerated, but they are based at any rate on firm and honest conviction."

A CRY AGAINST CANINE PERSECUTION IN MANDALAY.

THE Mandalay Herald utters a doleful cry. It is in a sad plight, which may any day turn into a mad one. It is the picture of misery—its last issue is the very voice of distress. Our contemporary is the victim of cruel, determined persecution. Unable to help himself, our brother has, in despair, repeatedly made the most piteous and affecting appeals for help to his gov'ners—of the city corporation. Alas! the Conscript Fathers of the municipal senate had stuffed their ears against his tale of woe! Knowing no other alternative, he has again sent a shriek. He has represented his case powerfully and brilliantly, and we trust, in compliment to the draughtsman at any rate, if for nothing else, the petition will be heard. Meanwhile, he is passing through a Purgatory before death—with indeed a constant fear of a horrible death. The enemies are formidable for numbers and persistence. They are simply irresistible. Their name is—Legion. And the cry is, still they come! And they all come crying. They multiply with the rapidity of Nature's scavengers in the Tropics. They pursue him night and morning and not silently by any means. The British infantry do not more habitually charge with a tremendous hooray than these attack with their characteristic halloo balloo. Indeed, they are for noise the worst set in the world. They are vagabonds of the worst type. If they want in courage somewhat they make up with cunning. They would enter your kitchen, and if they dared, even your dining-room, and walk off with your leg. They allow him no rest by day or night, being wide-awake. They spoil his best thoughts, disturbing his quiet meditations at dead of night. Sedentary as his pursuits naturally are, they have converted him into a fixture, pinning him to his chair. He is not permitted to take his constitutional. Day is not to be enjoyed on account of their noisy attentions, and night they make perfectly hideous. Wherever he may go, whatever path he may take, they are sure to dog him at every step. They are quite canine, and of no aristocratic sort, in their habits. They are veritable curs—simply Pariahs and Loafers of the species.

If our contemporary will forgive the "chaff," he is a foeman worthy of the steel of the best warrior among them. His vituperative powers are equal to the lungs of their barker-in-chief. In his address to the corporation he says:—

"Have you ever walked down a street of the Town over which you hold civic sway, and when so walking have you ever been followed for several hundred yards by a pack of howling, yelling, yelping, growling, snarling, barking, starving pariah dogs; and have these dogs occasionally made a snap at your venerated calves?"

That ought to silence the most determined Bow-wow eloquence. It reminds us of Disraeli the Younger's piling up of verbal castigation on the thin Editor of the Globe, for taking up the side of O'Connell in his famous youthful encounter with the Great Agitator.

His canine belligerents, if a generous foe, might compliment the Mandalay editor on his tremendous outcry against them as—

The wolf's long howl from Oonalsca's shore!

We cannot resist the temptation of quoting more:—

"Or have you thrown yourselves into profuse perspiration by wielding a stout walking stick over your heads and shouting, perhaps a little profanely, at a collection of quadrupeds, cants who have arranged themselves around you and glare at your extremities, encased in your best inexpressibles, with a hungry eye? Or have you ventured outside of your homes without a walking stick, and being watched and your defenceless position noted by a sneaking brute, who has often probably fed on the refuse from your house, have you been soon the object of interest of a yelping crowd, among whom you dash hither and thither with your arms working like a wind-mill and discharging stones like a catapult? And have you noticed that your betrayer, the brute that collected this yelling pack, has Judas-like sneaked away, after rendering you up to your enemies? Our City Fathers! We have endured this! The adventurous youth, who gazed on Diana in all the charms of her primitive bathing costume, was forthwith turned into a deer and hunted by his own dogs. But we who have never ventured on such sacred ground are yet worried by dogs. And yet the nymphs who display their charms around wells and ponds may like Diana be the cause. The Ancients had dogs to guard the mouth of Hell, and Mandalay—but comparisons are odious. But to return to our muttons, as the French say, and that nation have a happy way of expressing themselves, the pariah dogs in Mandalay will, unless their wholesale destruction is at once commenced, be in possession of the town in a few months. Deportation was tried, but although the dogs were sent across to the Sagaing side of the river, many of them managed to get back again. We have recognized a few old friends, or we should say enemies, who had been absent for several months, having probably been ex-patriated, and had returned to their old haunts. A pariah dog has the same love of home as a Scotchman."

It seems the authorities once deported them en masse, but to no purpose. After a few months, the cunning rascals contrived to come back—without any ticket.

This anticanine complaint is always the bagatelle that comfortable men are apt to think it. The inimitable Mogul historian of India Nawab Gholam Hossein Khan gravely narrated the inroads of dogs in Lahore as a great calamity. If there is no mistake in the text, it seems to have been a serious affair. Of course, we know nothing of the Mandalay nuisance. Europeans are apt to magnify these things. How they all talk of the dogs in Constantinople and other cities!

THE LITERATURE OF INDIAN LADIES.

It is worth noticing that while the mushroom University of Calcutta, not forty years old, already confers degrees on Blue-stockings, the University of Cambridge, over which the goddess of learning has presided for centuries, should even in this radical age, when women's rights and liberties are not only being freely discussed everywhere but receiving perhaps more than their legitimate share of recognition at the hands of the sterner sex, not be able to make up its mind for the same reform. Miss Fawcett, although she obtained more than 200 marks than the Senior Wrangler, will not be called so, even though she happens to be an English woman in her native country. Our women, therefore, ought to be thankful for their advantage. Although born in a subject country, they are in many ways better off than their sisters in England. For, have we not B. A.'s and M. A.'s among our girls? But India, at all events Bengal, will not stop there. Onward we are marching with all the serious zeal and the patient toil of schoolboys bent on a holiday excursion, nobody knowing whither we are bound for, or where we are to stop, disregarding counsel and ignoring difficulties. The careful observer of men and manners cannot fail to be struck with the changes that are almost daily taking place around and among us, in all directions and in all sorts of ways, especially those affecting our womankind. Shades of Kháná, Bidyoddamá, Atreyi, revisit these shores again, and see for yourselves what you were and what your sisters of the present age are! Your learning, your poetry, your mathematics, your astronomy, your thorough Aryan mind, have all undergone a complete change of front and aspect through which you many find it difficult to recognise their identity. The nation that once heard your songs with rapt attention, or admired your solutions of intricate mathematical problems, has passed away. Western education, Western culture, Western thought and Western enlightenment have invaded the country and are gradually pervading it from corner to corner. And the cry is for more. Whether we like it or no, such is the fact. It is foolish to try to stem the current of events. Change is the primary law of Nature, and change there will be. We must content ourselves with what we have, with the present, and not pine over, much less struggle to restore "The dead past," as Longfellow calls it, following the same poet's precept:—

"Act, act, in the living present, Heart within and God o'er head."

So, even the degrees, the academic distinctions which are denied to her sister in England, will not stop our lady graduate. From learning to teaching is but a step. They must write—and not write only but publish: they that sing at home will soon sing in public. They must tread on the footsteps of Ouida, Eliza Cook, George Elliot, and Felicia Hemans. They must not only produce novels and poems and issue books and brochures with male help, but they must edit magazines also. They do not content themselves with discarding the Zenana, but they also play tennis, run, dance, and what is more, ride too.

It cannot be denied that woman in Bengal is already on the high road to distinction in the sphere of letters. She has not only a separate literature for the sex but is ambitious of taking part in the literature of, and for, man, that is literature irrespective of sex. The Bharati, a high class Bengali magazine, is for the last dozen years being with great success edited by Srimati Sarna Kumari Devi. This accomplished lady is also the author of several meritorious works of fiction, like Deep Nirvana and others. But by far the best book as yet written by a Bengali lady is a collection of poems just published under the title of "Alo-o-ohaya," (Light and Shade.) It is introduced to the Bengali reading public with a prefatory note from Babu Hem Chunder Bannerjee, whose fame as a poet is considerable. Babu Hem Chunder speaks very highly of the fair author, and speaks of some of her poems as probably unrivalled. The authoress has very wisely or probably unwisely, withheld her name from the title page, but we do not think we betray any confidence when we say that she is Miss Kamini Sen, B.A., who obtained Honors in Sanskrit. Her language is chaste and elegant, but sometimes she is very mystical. With a heart full to overflowing of youthful feeling and pathos, she possesses the pleasing art of presenting with marked effectiveness purely oriental thoughts clothed in occidental garb. Her poems are generally the outcome of deep and serious thinking. Her book gives clear evidence of her close intimacy with Sanskrit literature, and a still closer insight into the speculative side of the Hindu mind in all its mysterious aspects. We recommend the public to read this book carefully, for it will amply repay such reading. There is yet another little book just published, which deserves special mention here. It bears the somewhat queer name of Pramila and is a collection of short poems occasionally written for the magazines. Here also the proverbial modesty, we will not say timidity, of the Hindu lady stands in the way of her openly and bravely coming forward before the public. We are told that the fair author is a lady of a very tender age, daughter of a Kayastha gentleman of the Bose clan, and bears the same name as her book. Some of her poems are very good indeed. Full of a sweet pathos, as they are, they will wring admiration from the most confirmed Nil admirari cynic. Her poems are clothed in very simple language, and lay bare a heart rich in tenderness. The pieces entitled "Biphale"—"Smriti"—"Ki Tumi"—"Deko ma amare"—will bear comparison with many much admired poems. Miss Bose has not, it is true, the erudition of Miss Sen, but she has equally broad sympathies. "Sayi Hashi" which is after Moore's "one dear smile" breathes a tone of deep despondency which is somewhat unnatural in a girl of her years. "Taba Kano" is a patriotic song, and may with great advantage be recited at the sittings of our Congress. We have always praise ready for those who really deserve it. It is therefore a very pleasing duty to us to be able to review favorably this little brochure. We hope more such books will gradually see the light, and pray that the young authoress of this one may live long to earn still higher laurels!

THE MOHURRUM DISTURBANCE AT MOORSHEDABAD.

Now that reports of ill-feeling between the Hindus and Mahomedans are being received from all parts of the country, an extraordinary and interesting item of news has fallen to the lot of this city to supply. Your readers are well aware that this city being for a long time the seat of the Mahomedan Government of Bengal has a very large Mahomedan population wherein the Shi'as—the descendants of the successive Nawabs Nazim and their retainers—form the most predominant element, though in number they are only a "small minority." The most important festival of the Mahomedans "The Mohurram" is consequently performed here with uncommon grandeur and pomp. It is a public Mahomedan festival, but the manner of observing it is different with each sect. The Shi'as, while they join in mourning the untimely death and offering prayers for the departed souls of their deceased Imams Hassen and Hossein, are further required to make certain formalities in outer manifestation of their grief, which the Sunnis highly resent. There is another custom which has received the sanction of the Shia Scriptures, which enforces on all true believers and mourners the sacred duty of imprecating curses on the enemies of their Imams, as also upon all infidels who were in any way connected with the murder of their martyrs. Such is the strict injunction of the saints that without this the ceremony is considered incomplete. This practice is generally known as Tuburrah. The Tuburrah in its viler form is objectionable to the Sunnis, for it is only the abuse of their Caliphs. Ever since the establishment* of this city, the reigning families having been Shi'as, this obnoxious privilege has always been enjoyed by the Shi'as without any the slightest interruption by the other sect. There is however an isolated instance of disturbance which took place in 1840, in the time of the late Nawab Nazim Humayoon Jah, the grandfather of the present Nawab Bahadur of Moorshedabad, when the pronouncing of the Tuburrah was strongly opposed by a body of Afghans, resulting in bloodshed. About three to four hundred persons were severely injured on the affray, and both the sects were bound down to keep the peace in the occasion of the succeeding festival. Later on in 1870, one Syed Ali tried but failed to disturb the ceremony, and the man was prosecuted and punished for his rash attempt. It was only four years ago that the ember of hostility was first propagated by the unmannerly conduct during the Mohurram of one individual menial Shia Mahomedan of the name of Ali Jan. The fire could not spread on account of the excellent arrangements of the Police and the preventive measures adopted by the Nawab Bahadur. The year before last a public notice was issued and circulated by His Highness prohibiting the Tuburrah. This was indeed an ill advised step inasmuch as it displeased the entire Shia community on the one hand and gave opportunity and license to the Sunnis on the other hand to take advantage of even the slightest plea to make a riot. The Shi'as could not brook the disgrace any more. Some of the brothers of the Nawab Bahadur determined at any risk to revive this year the Tuburrah and thus no more to suffer their festival remain in an incomplete state. The news spread like wildfire among the Sunni population who began immediately to hold meetings for its suppression. They applied for and obtained an injunction from the District Magistrate against the renewal of a practice which tended to cause a breach in the public peace. They were further emboldened by the fine position in which they were placed for they expected countenance in all their doings from the police and executive authorities of the Subdivision who fortunately for them belonged to their own sect. They also thought that the Nawab Bahadur's notice was favorable to them and that therefore no better opportunity could occur to give a deathblow to the pretensions of the Shi'as. Exalted by such hopes, they went out on the morning of Wednesday the 27th instant, when all the Tazias (paper coffins) were being carried in procession to Kerbala for interment, fully armed with sticks, lances and bamboos, presumably with the object of making a riot should a suitable opportunity occur. Finding that all the grand processions had managed well and were strong enough against their attack, they pursued the Tazia of Shahibzada Fyazuddin Ali Saheb which was accompanied by the Subdivisional officer himself. They were timely noticed by the Shi'as and requests were made to the authorities to disperse them. The entreaties of the Subdivisional officer pressing them to retire, and his assurance that there was nothing objectionable in the proceedings of the Shi'as, proved futile. The fanaticism of the mob heeded him not. The Sunnis began to enter the procession with shoes on, to fling stones, shoes and bamboos on the aulums (silver crescents) and to shower abuses on the Shi'as. Thus provoked, the Shi'as who were unarmed snatched away sticks from the Sunnis, took possession of the branches of the trees on the way and commenced to face the intruders. The Subdivisional officer, the European police inspector and others in charge of the procession were hurt. The lower police officers, most of whom were Sunnis, instead of trying to restore peace and order became themselves a party with the aggressors. The disturbance ended on the approach of the District Superintendent of Police, Mr. Kilby, with a detachment of police, when several arrests were made of men of both parties. Charges and counter-charges were preferred. The accused were subsequently enlarged on bail. Great sensation prevails in the city. The disturbance would have taken a formidable shape had it not been for the influence of the Nawab Bahadur who prevailed upon his brothers and the prominent members of his family to keep themselves away from the procession. It is rumoured that counsel will be brought from Calcutta to conduct the case here before the District Magistrate. The Sunnis, it is said, will be helped with men and money by a Mahomedan Zemin-dar of this district who, as the rumour runs, was especially brought here on the occasion of the Mohurram to give the Sunnis his support and strength.

A case of murder by a woman of the lower class is reported from Jiaganj. She, it is said, was not on good terms with her husband who used to tyrannise over her. She contemplated therefore to kill herself by drowning and thinking that her death will cause extreme pain to her son and daughter, resolved first to take their lives by administering opium. Her motives were discovered when she was about to drown herself. She was rescued, and her children who were then in a precarious state taken to hospital for treatment. The boy and girl expired after a few hours, and she is now in the hand of the police awaiting her trial.

The Lalakuri and Rampal embankments have given way and the Eastern part of the district is now wholly under water. The river is consequently at a stand still.

CORPORATION OF CALCUTTA.

THE Commissioners of Calcutta have resolved to offer to the holders of the 6 per cent. Municipal loan of 1st December 1870 for Rs. 3,00,000, falling due on the 1st December next, the option of exchanging such debentures to the extent of Rs. 2,64,000 for 5 per cent. debentures of a new Municipal loan to be raised this year 1890, and having a currency of 30 years.

The rate for the exchange is fixed at a premium of Rs. 4 per cent. on the amount of the 5 per cent. debentures that may be allotted to them.

As the amount of the 5 per cent. loan available for transfer is Rs. 2,64,000 only, it will be understood that the full amount of the 6 per cent. debentures, namely, Rs. 3,00,000, cannot be exchanged.

Holders of the 6 per cent. debentures desirous of effecting transfers, should communicate their wish in a letter to reach the Secretary to the Corporation on or before the 30th September next.

Such portion of the 6 per cent. debentures as may not be exchanged, will be repaid in cash on application on or after the 29th November 1890. Interest on these debentures will cease on the 30th November 1890.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridoon Jah, Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

THE HIGHWAY COW.

The hue of her hide was dusky brown,
Her body was lean and her neck was slim,
One horn turned up and the other turned down,
She was keen of vision and long of limb ;
With a Roman nose and a short stump tail,
And ribs like the hoops on a home-made pail.

Many a mark did her body bear :
She had been a target for all things known ;
On many a scar the dusky hair
Would grow no more where it once had grown ;
Many a passionate, parting shot
Had left upon her a lasting spot.

Many and many a well-aimed stone,
Many a brickbat of poodly size,
And many a cudgel swiftly thrown,
Had brought the tears to her loving eyes,
Or had bounded off from her bony back
With a noise like the sound of a rifle crack.

Many a day had she passed in the pound
For helping herself to her neighbour's corn ;
Many a cowardly cur and hound
Had been transfixed on her crumpled horn ;
Many a teapot and old tin pail
Had the farmer boys tied to her time-worn tail.

Old Deacon Gray was a pious man,
Though sometimes tempted to be profane
When many a weary mile he ran
To drive her out of his growing grain.
Sharp were the pranks she used to play
To get her fill and to get away.

She knew when the Deacon went to town ;
She wisely watched him when he went by ;
He never passed her without a frown,
And an evil gleam in each angry eye ;
He would crack his whip in a surly way,
And drive along in his "one-hoss shay."

Then at his homestead she loved to call,
Lifting his bars with crumpled horn ;
Nimbly scaling his garden wall,
Helping herself to his standing corn ;
Eating his cabbages, one by one,
Hurrying home when her work was done.

His human passions were quick to rise,
And striding forth with a savage cry,

With fury blazing from both his eyes,
As lightnings flash in a summer sky.
Redder and redder his face would grow,
And after the creature he would go.

Over the garden, round and round,
Breaking his pear and apple trees ;
Trampling his melons into the ground ;
Overturning his hives of bees,
Leaving him angry and badly stung,
Wishing the old cow's neck was wrung.

The mosses grew on the garden wall ;
The years went by with their work and play ;
The boys of the village grew strong and tall,
And the gray-haired farmers passed away
One by one as the red leaves fall,
But the highway cow outlived them all.

SUGGESTIONS.

HAPPY is the life of married people when,
She's the best of wives and he's the best of men.
When Adam first met Eve,
And Eve met Ad,
They never could believe
Each other bad.

She was never cross and never had cold feet :
He would never wink at the girls across the street.
He never sassed her ma ;
And held his tongue,
The best you ever saw
For one so young.

So you young beginners, starting out in life,
Kittie with her husband, Tom with such a wife,
If always to agree
You truly try,
You'll take the cake, and be
As good as pie.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment exert a rapidly favourable effect in all those diseases which are induced by exposure to damp or by great changes in temperature. They will therefore be found eminently serviceable to those who work in iron foundries, copper mines and collieries. These well-known remedies present manifest advantages in respect of use and effectiveness, being entirely compounded of vegetable drugs selected with the greatest care and regardless of price. When used in accordance with the ample printed directions which accompany them, they act surely but mildly, and do not interfere with the daily work. There are but few diseases which are not capable of cure—or, at all events, of great relief—if Holloway's remedies are perseveringly used.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

LORD Lansdowne, we are glad to find, has shaken off the fever he contracted from a sudden change of climate on his return from Pangri to Simla. He is no longer confined to his room but takes carriage exercise. The Viceroy starts on his winter tour towards the end of October, leaving Simla on the 21st. He visits Patiala, Nabha, Ulwar, Ajmere, Oodeypore, Jodhpur, Mount Abu, Jeypore, Delhi, Agra, Bhurtpore, Deeg, and Benares. The viceregal party is timed for Calcutta on Tuesday, the 9th December.

WE are really sorry to find that the Maharaja of Durbhanga who has been suffering more or less from, if we mistake not, the last year, is not restored to his previous health. He had been making a rather long stay at Calcutta from the beginning of this year for treatment. He had improved somewhat under Dr. Coates, then Principal of the Medical College, and gone home. But he seems to have relapsed there, and now it is announced that he has been advised to take a thorough change. The conditions of living imposed by his religion—to which he is staunch—make a sea voyage out of the question for him. He therefore goes to the hills, taking up his residence at Simla.

WE are glad to announce that the Ameer-i-Kabeer of the Deccan is all right now and will in about two weeks leave for Seronungur. He had come to his town residence to take part in the Mohurum ceremonies but fell ill and remained so all the time, attended by the old Sawbones of Calcutta who has managed to become the Hunter and Sydenham and Lister and Simpson combined of that place.

NAWAB Intesar Jung, the Revenue Secretary to the Nizam's Government, has offered to retire on pension.

THE High Court goes into the Long Vacation next week on the 17th. With the closing of the Court, the Officiating Justices Messrs. R. F. Rampini, H. W. Gordon and C. H. Hill go back to their old places, the Judges for whom they have been acting being due here at the reopening of the Court. The Hon'ble Messrs. Prinsep and Wilson have been told off as Vacation Judges.

THE time of Raja Durga Churn Law and Syed Ameer Hossein is up in the Viceroy's Legislative Council. The latter has served two terms and it is time for another competent Mahomedan. Who succeeds him?

THE Government of India has allotted a lac of rupees this year for camps of exercise and divisional manœuvres.

NEXT November, there will be a Camp of Exercise in the neighbourhood of Attock. The Northern or Peshawar force will attack and the Rawalpindi defend. The former will be formed of a battery of horse artillery, two field and three mountain batteries, 1,500 native cavalry, two battalions of British infantry, seven native infantry regiments and a company of sappers, or a total of about 9,000 men. The defending force will be only 8,000 men—or one horse, one field and two mountain batteries, one British and two native cavalry regiments, three and a half battalion of British infantry, four native infantry regiments and a company of sappers.

It has been arranged that "When a soldier or small party of soldiers are ordered to travel by rail the officer who issues the railway warrant will also attach coupons thereto, at the rate of two coupons for each day the man travels. They will be of the value of six annas each, and upon presentation at any refreshment-room will entitle the man to a plate of meat, a pound of bread and a pint of tea or coffee. The railway authorities will take over the coupons and deal with them in audit as cash vouchers."

It is reported from Madras that

"The Secretary of State has revised the rules regarding the acceptance of fees by public officers. The rules cover the cases of honoraria from funds controlled by the Government and the acceptance of fees by Government servants from persons or bodies over whose funds the Government has no control. They also confer larger powers on Local Governments and the Government of India as regards sanctioning rewards from public revenues."

MADRAS is truly benighted as regards Tea. In 1889, there were only 110 tea gardens with a total acreage of 7,271, including 4,589 under mature plants. The total outturn weighed 8,84,916 pounds.

THE breaks in the Darjeeling Himalayan Railway have been made up and thorough communication restored on the line for passengers, luggage, parcels and goods. Since the 4th, on the Oudh and Rohilkhand Railway, trains are also running as usual, the breach between Lucknow and Cawnpore having been repaired. On the Eastern Bengal Railway, at Bagola, passengers are still transhipped, but the piers of the bridge have been shored up with metalling which has been found to stand the strain of more than ordinary traffic. Thorough traffic will be restored next week.

ON the 3rd, a native powder factory at Gujrat was blown off, killing eight persons. It appears a large quantity of sulphur, while being ground in a handmill, caught fire through friction.

AN extensive forgery of counterfeit rupee and postage stamps has been traced out in Bombay. The imitation of stamps was so perfect that but for the water mark, it could not be detected. A London collector first suspected the fraud.

ONE Chhedi, a Khatri and a budmash, and Anuntu, a mali in the Maharaja's employ, with three others are being tried for attempting the murder of the Benares Dewan, Baleswar Prasad. It has transpired in the enquiry by the Magistrate Mr. James White, that Baboo Ram Padarat Singh, one of the close attendants of the Maharaja, had employed the men, to revenge himself on the Dewan for depriving him of his perquisites. He has therefore been arrested and charged with abetment of the offence. The Dewan has taken fright and is now protected by a special guard of one head constable, ten constables and one sowar. The Ramnagar police has also been replaced by a fresh body.

CAPTAIN Norman alias Nelson, an ex-officer in Her Majesty's service, is wanted in Bombay. He purchased jewellery from two shops to the value of Rs. 2,000 promising payment by cheques. But no cheques were drawn or offered and he left Bombay the same day without payment. Warrants are out for his apprehension at Suez.

ON the prosecution of the Board of Trade, the Bow-street Magistrate fined the Captain of the Glen Rosa steamer of the Victoria Steamboat Company £15 and 1s. for each of the 307 persons in excess of his proper number carried from London to South-end, on a Bank holiday. We believe a Bank holiday in England is equivalent to a "public holiday" in India under the Negotiable Instruments Act. But public holidays are at a discount in this country. They are not scrupulously kept, and yet Government fights shy of allowing the full term.

THE Deputy Magistrate of Howrah, Baboo C. N. Chatterjee, has fined a groom Khagoo Chamar Rs. 10 with the alternative of 15 days' imprisonment, for wrongful restraint of H. A. B. Evatt, of Ghosery. While Evatt was leaving his house in his dog cart, the groom who had left the service that day, rushed up and seized hold of the reins, demanding instant payment of the wages due. A policeman came up and removed Khagoo. There the matter would in most cases have ended, but Evatt would not, could not leave it there. He had probably reason to fear of being stopped on the Queen's highway. So he submitted to the lesser evil of appearing in Court on the same level with his native groom as a complainant against him. The Baboo Magistrate was no doubt shocked at the audacity of the fellow in defying Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights and the Habeas Corpus Act and the rest of it, and convicted the unspeakable Khagoo. So far so good, and we trust the injured spirit of Britannia has been appeased. But then what about the poor man's wages? We hope the master will be generous enough not to drive him to Court.

For the rest, impertinent boldness of menial servants seems a growing feature of modern life in Calcutta—European or Native.

Relying on the welcome of the petty Courts, they rush at once to them without waiting for their dues from their masters. It is very rarely, however, that they take the law in their own hands.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

THE American merchants have joined the English Shipowners in their movement against labour strikes.

The Australian Steamship Companies have been enabled to resume the service along the coast with freemen. For molesting the freemen, several Unionists have been fined or imprisoned. With that news is coupled the disagreeable intelligence of the refusal of 9,000 employees to work the Broken Hills mines.

There was a strike in England too at Southampton. On the 9th, the striking dockers and coalheavers attacked the blacklegs and barred their access to the docks. The police being powerless to restore order, half a battalion of the Yorkshire Regiment was called in from Gosport, who cleared the approaches to the docks with the fire hose. This enraged the strikers the more, and later on they attacked the troops with stones, breaking the nose of Lieutenant Abercrombie and otherwise injuring two privates. The Mayor appealed to the Riot Act which was read. This only drew a volley of stones on his premises from the infuriated mob. The disturbance could only be quelled by repeated bayonet charges and by wounding many of the crowd. To prevent repetition of disorderly scenes, 250 more soldiers were brought in. Gun-boats patrolled the harbour to prevent picketing. The dock approaches and other points were in military occupation. This continued for 2 or 3 days. The mutineers finding that the London executive condemned their action and refused to support them, have now submitted, and are anxious to resume work. At any rate, the town is quiet. There have been 26 arrests.

THE King of Portugal who had been suffering from typhoid fever has been pronounced out of danger.

THREE British officers have been stabbed by some Spaniards at a picnic on Spanish soil near Gibraltar. The wounds are not serious. They fell out on some financial question.

THE Emperor Francis Joseph has decreed the outlay of two million florins for repairs of the damage done by the floods at Prague and the relief of the sufferers.

A DESTRUCTIVE fire has laid waste 250 acres at Salonica. No water being available, it raged for full 24 hours, destroying the consulates, mosques, churches, hospitals and most valuable archives.

THE Indian pilgrims to Mecca have been brought back to Bombay. They were in quarantine at Camaran since July 3, and were not permitted to land at Jeddah. They suffered the greatest privation having run out of their provisions and money and as many as 150 of their fellow pilgrims died.

WITH the return of the Prodigal Dhulip to England, the hope of the Sikh refugees—the sons of the late Sirdar Thakur Singh, Dhulip's chief agent in India—at Pondicherry have revived. They too have applied to the Government of India for pardon.

THE criminal sessions was opened on Monday week by Mr. Justice Prinsep, C. S. That duty is no longer restricted to Barrister Judges, though no Native Judge has yet presided. It is no doubt feared—not without very good reason—that the natives might make a mess of it, but that fear might be dismissed since Brother Wilson is at hand to save them from any contresmpts.

R. H. D'Cruz charged with attempting to murder his wife Wilhelmina and with voluntarily causing her grievous hurt, was found guilty on the second count only and sentenced to three years' rigorous imprisonment.

IT was a bloody Sessions marked by Draconian severity against petty vermin.

A pick-pocket, an old offender, for theft of 4 annas, was ordered four years' rigorous imprisonment and a whipping of thirty stripes!

Another old offender for house-breaking and petty theft received five years and whipping with 30 stripes!

A third old offender—a Bengali—for wresting a gold mohur attached to the watch chain of a Mahomedan, at the Registrar's sale in the Court premises, was sentenced to 8 years' hard labour! He was spared the flogging.

IN the Connaghur "Ghat Murder" case, Womesh Chunder Ghose was indicted for murder, culpable homicide not amounting to murder, causing death by doing a rash and negligent act of and grievous hurt to Chamatkaree. When he was sent up he was on bail, but the bail was withdrawn for the charges added at the office of the Clerk of the Crown. The same barrister who defended Harimohan Maiti defended Womesh Chunder Ghose. In the present case, out of the nine jurors, eight were Bengalis. Eight European jurors were challenged on behalf of the prisoner. The trial lasted two days—Tuesday and Wednesday. We give below the address of the Judge to the Jury:—

"His lordship summed up at considerable length. He said that it had given him particular satisfaction to find that the jury was composed almost entirely of Hindoo gentlemen, who devoted much care and attention to the hearing of the case, and whose education and intelligence and high social position would enable them to give a verdict such as would satisfy the ends of the case. It was hardly necessary for his lordship to go at any length through the evidence after the careful way in which it had been laid before them by the counsel for the prisoner, who had said everything that might have been said. Nevertheless he would trouble them with a brief statement of the evidence so as to enable them to arrive at a verdict on the facts disclosed. His lordship then gave a history of the case. There was evidence that before the removal of the woman to the ghât the prisoner was advised to take her to hospital, and to one of the witnesses he said that she did not like to go to the Medical College Hospital, but wished to be taken to the river-side as she was dying. The jury had to consider first of all whether that statement had been made, and next as to what effect it had upon the mind of the prisoner. They had also to decide whether they believed that that wish was ever expressed by the woman. On this point they had the evidence of one witness, who said that he had heard from the prisoner that she had made this statement. Then there was the evidence of the two women who were living in the same house with the deceased. They said that they heard from the outside the deceased make this statement. His lordship asked the jury to consider whether it was possible for the woman being in that condition to speak in a voice which could be heard from outside. But if they did believe the statement was made, they must consider how far it had any effect upon the prisoner in removing her. They had the fact that no medical aid was given to the unfortunate woman up to the time she was taken to the ghât. Considering the circumstances under which she was taken to the ghât, was there any necessity for taking her in such a hurry without any preparation, and without seeing whether the gungabasi house was in a proper state to receive her? There was no necessity of taking her there in such a hurry, and keeping her under a tree for several hours. The medical evidence showed conclusively that she died from neglect in consequence of her treatment before she was brought to the Eden Hospital. The jury had to consider what was the real object of the prisoner in taking her to the ghât when she was in the point of childbirth. The evidence showed that she had been living openly with the prisoner, and the jury had to consider whether the scandal arising from the report of this illicit intimacy could not have been aggravated by the fact of the birth of the child, and whether the prisoner was not therefore interested in endeavouring to conceal the birth, and whether that might not have been one of his objects for removing her to the ghât, and whether also that might not have been one of the reasons for his not calling medical attendance to ascertain the cause of her sickness and to give her relief. It was clear that the prisoner was accelerating the woman's death by keeping her at the gungabasi house, and that he did not do his best to attend to her comforts. His lordship in conclusion asked the jury to consider the charge of having caused her death by a rash and negligent act, which did not amount to murder."

The Jury retired for 38 minutes and returned a unanimous verdict of guilty on the charge of causing death by negligence. The Judge then sentenced the accused to two years' rigorous imprisonment—the full term allowed by the law. Let no one be sorry that the brutal man has been overtaken by his just reward. He was base enough to destroy the woman whom he pretended to love and whose virtue he had robbed, and his own child by her. If he did not stab or poison he employed killing neglect against his innocent victims. Surely, the law will not allow Negligent use of concubine or bride.

THE Chartered Bank Fraud case has, on the opposition of the defending counsel Mr. Jackson, been broken up into two separate trials against the father and the son. He pointed out last week that the lumping of charges, that is, the inclusion of the various sums in one charge, was against law and that the ends of justice would be defeated as the accused would be prejudiced if tried together. This was allowed by the presiding Judge on the advice of Mr. Wilson—now the recognized Gamaliel of the Bench—who had been consulted. The trial of the father Shama Churn Sen, the cashier, commenced on Monday and is still proceeding. Twelve lacs of rupees are unaccounted for in the books of the bank in the course of eight years. Attempts had been made to hush up the matter, the cashier agreeing to pay 5 lacs provided he was fully released. The negotiations, however, fell through, and criminal proceedings were commenced against Aubinash the son and Shama Churn the father.

THE prosecution of the Tribune has commenced at the Lahore magistracy. * Mr. Warburton, late District Superintendent of Police, Amritsar, has charged Babu Sitala Kanta Chatterjee, Editor, Ahmed Ali, Printer, and Sirdar Dayal Singh Gil Majhitiah, Proprietor, of the paper with having defamed him in successive issues. The proceedings are voluminous, but the most important fact may be separated. The editor offered a full apology for what had appeared in the paper regarding the mother of the prosecutor but for nothing else—a crime for which we expect the right reverend man of the East to croak against his fallen brother in the West. Mr. Warburton, as a full blooded Afghan as he confessed himself, was not to be so easily appeased. He would leave to the Court to deal with the apology as the Magistrate thought best in mitigation of punishment. A second prosecution for libel arising out of the same matter but against a different person—though not a lot—has cropped up. In the course of his examination, the editor mentioned the name of his correspondent. Mr. Warburton took advantage of the opportunity and has obtained a summons against Mr. Buchanan, a schoolmaster of Gujrat, for defamation.

ONE of the latest instructions of Government regarding the census is, that the return should shew the occupation of workers and in the case of non-workers that of the person who supports them. This instruction does not include persons who do not work but enjoy independent means.

ACCORDING to the Calcutta Noter of the Indian Planters' Gazette, Mr. Justice Norris has been offered the chance of immortality as Chairman of the Reception Committee of the coming Congress. For once the learned gentleman hesitates. He has taken time to think.

In another note, the writer says:—

"It is said that the Government of India was much displeased at such a telegram (he sent home before the meeting held by the delegates at Cardiff, announcing his support of such views) having been sent by a Judge of the High Court, and that a communication to that effect was sent to the Chief Justice. Sir Comer Petheram, however, if report speaks truly, vigorously took up the cudgels in defence of Mr. Norris, and the right of the judges in general to express any political opinions which they might hold, so long as they were not opposed to the authority of the Government. This, I am told, has produced another letter from the Government of India, and as the feud between the Government of India and the High Court is one of very long standing, though they mutually express the highest respect and esteem for one another, the correspondence, I understand, is not as yet finished."

Perhaps, that accounts for the hesitation.

THE Bombay Legislature must be more knowing than experts. It is well-known that the medical faculty throughout the world are not agreed as to the contagiousness of leprosy. If anything, the weight of opinion is against the alarmist view. The Legal Remembrancer of the Western Presidency is, however, of opinion that the Bombay Act VI of 1867 has declared the disease infectious and dangerous to life and health, and that, under the said Act, the leper is liable to compulsory removal to sanatoria. It was just the interpretation after the heart of his Chiefs, and we shall not be surprised to see the smart man quickly receiving a lift over the heads of half a dozen seniors. The Bombay Government has now found its way clear, and with a view to encourage segregation—the rage of the hour—has instructed the Presidency Magistrates to deal with the lepers according to the opinion of the Legal Remembrancer. We hope the Bombay Magistrates will examine the law for themselves before depriving any leper of his liberty. What is the Advocate-General's interpretation?

THE last annual report of the Rajputana States contains the following sympathetic notice by Colonel Walter's successor of his efforts at social reform in those States:—

"These continue to prosper. A third meeting of the 'Walterkrit Rajputra Hitkarini Sabha' was held in February 1890, when the working of the rules during the previous year was discussed, and reforms on some minor points, which experience had shown to be necessary, were introduced.

Though Colonel Walter's guiding hand has now been withdrawn, and his long and intimate acquaintance with Rajputana, his personal influence with its Chiefs and Thakurs, are possessions which any successor of his must envy, I believe the rules inaugurated by his counsel for the reduction of marriage and funeral expenses will work suo motu, being, as I know them to have been, the outcome of groanings which Thakurs, afraid of being banned by Charans, yet longing to escape from the bondage of ruinous custom, were almost afraid to utter even to a British officer. The public interest which has been evoked by these social reforms, and the reputation they have brought to Rajputana, should further stimulate those whom they concern to see that everything about them is always real, and that the main rules laid down by the Sabha are properly observed."

We have always turned into these Rajputana reports to see how Colonel Walter's reforms were taking with the people. It was indeed a bold thing to experiment upon a race so much wedded to old notions as the Rajputs, and we must confess that we were not much sanguine of the success in the long run of the movement made for the check on extravagance in marriage and funeral ceremonies. While similar movements were hanging fire in more advanced parts of the country, it would have been strange, even with the supreme influence of Political over Native Chiefs, if they met a better fate here. We feared with the withdrawal of the personal influence of Colonel Walter, things would revert to their normal condition. The above paragraph is no without a hint of the inherent difficulty of the problem.

MR. Finucane's annual report of the progress of land surveys and settlements for the last year is an interesting record of progress. There were 83 estates, lying in 20 separate districts, under survey and settlement operations, of which 51 are Government, 9 Wards, and the remainder private Zemindary estates. The financial results of the resettlements to the owners of the estates are in all cases highly satisfactory. In one Wards estate, namely the Burdwan Raj, the work of the Agricultural Department has proved of service in a new direction. Villages belonging to this estate have been found to have been long appropriated by other people, and steps are being taken to recover their possession. The Director of Agriculture notices the discovery as follows:—

"In the course of the survey operations it came to light that a large number of mouzahs belonging, it is alleged, to the Burdwan Raj estates, which had never been let in putni or otherwise alienated, had been taken possession of by others. Towji No. 4 of the Bankoora district contains, according to the Collectorate records, 349 mouzahs, and was purchased by the Raj, at a sale for arrears of revenue, about the year 1828. Of these 349 mouzahs, 3 were given in putni by the Raj within a year or two after the purchase, leaving 346 mouzahs apparently khas. In 1855 thakbust maps were prepared, and in these thak maps and records, a number of persons had their names registered as proprietors of 161 mouzahs, appertaining to towji No. 4, without opposition on the part of the Raj, thus leaving 185 mouzahs still to be accounted for. Of these, 90 have been traversed as undisputed khas mouzahs, leaving 95 mouzahs of which nothing was known except their names. They were not shown in the Raj books, but from enquiries made on the spot by the Survey Officer, Mr. Scott, it was ascertained that they were in possession of one Beni Madhub Banerjee of Bankoora, who, it was found, had neither registered his name as proprietor nor filed road cess papers for them. In order to ascertain where they are situated, and to enable the Raj to adopt measures for resuming khas possession of them, a traverse and boundary survey of all lands appertaining to towji No. 4 was ordered under the Survey Act, V of 1875.

Similar confusion is said to prevail in towjis Nos. 1 and 3 of the Bankoora district, and the fact is significant, as illustrating the chaotic state of the records kept, in Bengal, in zemindari offices supposed to be well managed. Mr. Reilly has resumed khas possession of many of these mouzahs without opposition, and the persons in possession of others have applied to him to come to terms with them, as to the settlement of them."

The work of the Department in regard to agricultural experiments does not seem so far to have been attended with any marked results.

A RUSSIAN General jumped into a tram car. There being no vacant seat, he ordered a Jew to get down. He refused. The General cried out, "Do you know who I am? I am General———" The Jew with a bow simply said: "You are a General of the Military, not of Civilians." The General jostled the Israelite out and took the ejected occupier's seat. Not content with making himself comfortable on his journey, at another's expense, the man of war reported the matter to the Commissioner of Odessa. That official immediately notified in the newspapers that from that date Jews riding in tram-cars must vacate their seats whenever required by the 'Gentile, if not genteel or gentle, Russ; Jews objecting would be handed over to the police, and the Deputy Commissioner might, without trial, give them twenty-five stripes, besides ordering them to quit Odessa within 24 hours. A pretty state of things in a country claiming to be civilized! The Governor-General, however, seeing this order in the papers, telephoned to the Chief Commissioner to recall it, saying it might bring about a revolution as on a former occasion. So this satrap is not in the least ashamed of the business, but only afraid of its political consequences. Those of our countrymen who have been worked up by a foolish writing and speaking into a spurious disloyalty, who are so ready without knowledge or thought to denounce the rapacity and tyranny of the British, and who even affect to regard with an easy indifference, if not positive joy, the prospect of Cossack domination in India, ought to ask themselves this plain question, How would they like to live in Odessa? They could not possibly endure such a rule as that prevailing in Russia. Time was perhaps when they might have done so and been yet tolerably happy. It is British Rule that has changed them into susceptible beings. And what prevents the British from being in India like the Russians? Their enlightenment and political advancement and their character. John Bull is not a bear that has seen the world. And God is merciful that he is not.

THE Calcutta Public Library lately advertised for a Secretary. Of course, for a quiet office in magnificent airy quarters overhanging the great river that sweeps past our capital, there were numerous applicants. There was a competition of all races, nations, creeds, classes, and sexes. As not unfrequently happens, the dark horse has won.

Baboo Bepin Chundra Pal's candidature was a surprise. But more notable things have happened. We hope his people will allow him to fulfil his engagements.

He is a man of high ability and, we believe, of strong character, but a little too good, we suspect, if not for human nature's daily food, at any rate for personal success. He has been in all the Provinces of India and seen life in them all below high. He is a literary man in Bengali and English. In the Jubilee year he wrote in his mother tongue a most eloquent Life of the Queen-Empress as the Model Woman, which, if India had been decently cared for, would long since have been suitably brought to Her Majesty's notice, and would have brought to its author as much honour as his sovereign might venture to confer upon a black Theodore Martin. He is above all a true orator. Professionally or in active life, he has been a reformer—religious, social, and political. He was known as a Brahmo missionary of the advanced section until the Congress developed him into a considerable agitator. A Librarianship on a pittance without a prospect is not, we submit, the proper vocation for such a spirit of wild energy and enterprise. It is a waste of mind and muscle to confine such a man to such, we cannot say, improper but uncongenial occupation. But then a man must live. It is a melancholy reflection for us all that, under the political situation of India, there is no provision for such gifted sons of her.

In one respect this selection is about the best. For a languishing concern like this great Public Library, deserted by the public—the learned as well as the merely reading—the best deliverer would have been the prime gal At., to speak Sam Slick.

Beauty draws us by a single hair, you know. Our angel of a blue-stocking would have drawn all Calcutta to the learned groves of the Metcalfe Hall by the profusion of a Bengali head of hair and the taste and refinement of an educated lady. But as Paris was suddenly seized with an unaccountable shyness and not only did not hand the Dead Sea Apple of Discord over to the fairest but refused it to any of the fair, that was a lucky accident by which it fell to the strong man. As he was in for, and now has got the place, he will justify the choice of his constituents. With his ability and energy, supported by the Committee, he ought to make the institution more thriving than ever.

THE many friends in India of Mr. Munro, late Chief of the London Police, will be glad to learn that he is coming out to this country, for a considerable stay. The reason given is Mrs. Munro's health with which our climate suited. That cannot be all, we suspect. An active man of great energy in the prime of life cannot possibly condemn himself voluntarily to burial alive for any length of time, even to keep a good wife in company and countenance. He can scarcely come out again on State employment, unless of the highest sort independent of service restrictions. But inquiries in connection with schemes of commerce are still open to him. An able man of large Indian experience might always be useful to British capitalists.

IN the Durbhunga cow-killing riot prosecution, the trying Magistrate Mr. Maddox has convicted all the accused Hindus and sentenced—two of them to a fine of Rs. 1,000 each, in default 6 months' rigorous imprisonment, one to Rs. 100 or one month, and 17 more to terms of imprisonment, namely, three to six months' hard labor each, one to 12 months', six to 18 months' and seven more to one month's each. Two escaped the vengeance of magistracy by death. It was all a one-sided affair, cut and dry. The District Magistrate having deposed that he "did not see the Mahomedans do any acts of violence. I saw no laties in their hands, and their attitude was one of protest. They were in a minority," and having himself made several of the arrests, the doom of the Hindus was sealed.

Other cases are pending or maturing against the Hindus. We read in the I. D. News, under date Durbhunga, Sep. 10:—

"On the late Bukrid day, the date of the cow-killing riot occurrence, some Mahomedan butchers, when bringing some cows to the town from the mofussil for making sacrifices on the day in question, were on their way to town mercilessly beaten by some Hindus, and the cows were forcibly seized and taken away. Regarding this highway robbery, a criminal charge was preferred against the Hindus, and the case, after several adjournments, was taken up to-day by a senior Deputy Magistrate, Baboo Chunder Bhushan Chuckerbutty, who, having made out a formal charge against the Hindus, has put the case off to the 16th instant—the three accused, including one Brahmin, being in the meanwhile remanded to jail in custody. The case, like the riot, is causing much sensation among the public here. What is more noteworthy is that another case of a similar nature is shortly to be instituted, and this, and all the instances heretofore observed, will greatly tell upon the personalities and cruelties of the Hindus. The charge about to be brought up is that on the Bukrid day a Mussulman trader was passing the scene of the riots with bundles of clothes and valuables. On reaching there he was unmercifully beaten, and his clothes and all that he had on him were looted. These facts, amongst others, will show to the public the wrongs that are daily done to the poor Mussulmans by the Hindus in defiance of the English law."

THE COURTALLAM SCANDAL.

THE sensation in Indian politics is the Courtallam Scandal. The incidents are extremely painful, and what is particularly to be regretted, they have furnished a handle to fomenters of race animosities. These animosities naturally die hard, but it is curious to note how they manage to flourish in out-of-the-way nooks beyond the reach of influences before which they give way in important centres of life and business. The injured party is, of course, the mild Hindu, although we cannot exculpate him of all responsibility for what has happened. Indeed, neither of the two parties seems to be free from blame, whatever the disparity in the measure of their respective faults. The outrage committed by a European planter upon a Hindu lady was extremely cowardly, while the conduct of the district officers was indiscreet in the highest degree. The Hindus were to blame, but in a very slight degree. They might as well have waited for a judicial settlement of their claims which had been involved in some degree of uncertainty by their own laches in the past. Having tamely given way once, they need not have thought of enforcing their right. The dispute between the natives and the European residents relates to the right of bathing at the Courtallam waterfalls in the Tinnevely district at the earlier hours of the day. It has been repeatedly described by British and foreign travellers and tourists, the last time lately in connection with illustrations in the Empress fortnightly magazine. The old Hindu sages have shown their taste by voting this place sacred. It is a lovely sight—the most romantic in India—certainly of any site out of the great mountains or high hills. Not 500 feet in height, it is almost Himalayan in its climate and characteristics, its botany and zoology. It is a miniature Alpine locality, where the smallest waterfall has a descent of 100 feet. It has always been Hindu, but of late the Europeans have usurped it, pushing the old occupiers into a corner! Below the little cascade is a bathing pool at the foot of a temple. The right of bathing naturally belonged to the native Hindus from time immemorial. The falls were resorted to at all hours for the religious merit of a bath in the waters by people from surrounding villages to the distance of many miles all the year round, while water for worshipping and cooking purposes is taken from them from the earliest hour in the morning. Thus the right of the Hindus to the use of this place without restrictions as to time was of a kind not to be summarily set aside or encroached upon. But Right is proverbially feeble before Might. The local Europeans suddenly discovered some 6 years ago the sanitary value of the place. Not exceeding half a dozen at the most, and even this number not permanently resident at the village, they determined to have the use of the falls all to themselves for bathing and swimming in the morning hours to the exclusion of the natives. Their use, however, was confined to the three months of the south-west monsoon—"the season" as it is usually called—and it was for the convenience of such a handful of Europeans for such a short space of time, an accommodating District Magistrate in 1884 issued an extraordinary notice arbitrarily fixing the hours for the use of the falls by Europeans until 9-30 P.M., after which they were available for natives. This order was not worth the paper on which it was written and hung up at the falls. Yet nevertheless it was timidly or good-naturedly submitted to by the Hindus concerned till their acquiescence gave it somewhat of the force of a custom. They themselves admit that although it was a most unjust prohibition, they, placing loyalty as the first duty before them, had not particularly objected to the Europeans bathing first in the waterfalls during the season. This was a weak surrender of an ancient right—a surrender all the more to be deprecated as interfering with valued religious observances. Having given way at all, they tacitly helped in the assertion of a right on the part of the Europeans. They now keenly contest that right but the difficulty is partly of their own creation. One thing, however, must in fairness be said in bar of the this right claimed on the part of the Europeans. The magisterial order was never strictly observed. The Europeans were always a fluctuating population at the place. Formerly when there were copious monsoon showers, they used to come in numbers, but latterly the number has fallen off considerably till it sometimes happened that there were no Europeans to use the bath except Mr. Clarke, a resident Coffee planter and his wife. These latter often did not use the bath. From this uncertainty in the use of the falls by Europeans, the magistrate's arbitrary prohibition came to be imperfectly enforced. The enforcement of it was, at any rate, very lax. This laxness would naturally lead to habitual evasions of the order. When there was no knowing if the only too permanent Europeans at the place were coming to the bath or not, people would naturally be tempted to bathe during the prohibited hours, particularly as the prohibition was a great hardship especially to people coming from a distance. The remissness of the guards was a necessary consequence of the uncertainty of the European visits to the falls. The authority of the District Magistrate was too far off to check the remissness of subordinates. This appears to us to be an important consideration in appraising the strength of the so-called custom claimed in the subsequent developments of the quarrel.

There is no doubt the Magistrate's notice often fell into desuetude. On this point, we have the following clear statement from the Hindu :—

"As a matter of fact this year the notice had been hung up for two or three weeks, but natives used to go to the falls at all hours when there were no Europeans, and no one objected to their doing so. In fact the European community felt that a rigorous exclusion of the natives during the prohibited hours would be unjustifiable and harsh and as their privacy was not intruded upon the one or two Europeans who had come for the season did not insist upon a strict adherence to the hours in the notice. We believe we are correct in saying that, for a week or so before the assault on the Hindu lady, Mr. and Mrs. Clarke used daily to bathe at the falls and the natives also were going long before 9-30 A.M., but not, of course, when the Europeans were there. The first disturbance of this harmony and good understanding was due to the events of the 26th July which are given below."

To turn now to the outrageous and ungallant treatment of a lady. The facts are thus given in the same journal :—

"On the morning of that day at about 6-30 or 7 A.M., the wife of Mr. Krishna Iyer, went to the falls to bathe as usual. She used to go there daily at that hour ever since she came to Courtallam. She was, as usual, accompanied by her husband, who, however, stood on the temple side of the bridge which one has to cross to get to the falls. Just as Mrs. Krishna Iyer was passing towards the enclosure, Mrs. Clarke and another European lady came near the bridge. Mrs. Clarke told Mr. Krishna Iyer that she was going to bathe and asked him to recall his wife. Mr. Krishna Iyer recalled his wife, and this lady came back and sat on the low parapet, some distance outside the enclosure. Mrs. Clarke insisted on the Hindu lady being called away altogether from the place and made to go near the temple. Mr. Krishna Iyer did not see the necessity for this. There was no intrusion on Mrs. Clarke's privacy, as his wife was out of the enclosure, and some distance from it, and the demand of Mrs. Clarke appeared to him to be unreasonable. But Mrs. Clarke who with the other Europeans had enjoyed the sweets of despotic power so long under the ægis of the Collector's notice could not brook this opposition and she ran straight to her house to bring her husband who is Secretary to the 'Bathing Fund.' In this capacity he is looked upon as the sole monarch of the falls, and invested with full power to regulate the bathing at them. The wife of Mr. Krishna Iyer finding that the European ladies had gone away went into the enclosure and bathed there. Just as she was bathing the Ayah of Mrs. Clarke who was in the enclosure told her that Mr. and Mrs. Clarke were coming. She bundled up her clothes, and came out of the enclosure and was nearing the bridge on her way home. Mr. Krishna Iyer was standing on the side of the bridge. Mr. Clarke crossed the bridge and his wife pointed out Mrs. Krishna Iyer as the person that had bathed at the falls in the hours set apart for Europeans. Mr. Clarke got behind Mrs. Krishna Iyer and pushed her by the neck from behind. She was near falling down. He again gave her another push by the neck. Mr. Krishna Iyer who was on the temple said of the bridge then ran up to his wife's rescue and some Hindus who had witnessed the scene ran up also. Mr. Krishna Iyer is said to have caught hold of Mr. Clarke's arm to prevent further violence to his wife."

The outrage naturally provoked the resentment of the Hindu community who held a meeting at which resolutions were passed expressing indignation at the conduct of Mr. Clarke and calling in question the legality of their exclusion from the bath before 9-30 P.M. A criminal charge was also laid against Mr. Clarke. The next morning at a little after 6 A.M. some of the people of the Dewān of Mysore who had just at this time been making a temporary stay at Courtallam, having come there on leave for the benefit of his health, went to the falls to bathe. It is not certain whether these men went to bathe in the usual way, or with the premeditated object of forcibly giving effect to the latter resolution of the meeting. It was alleged they had sticks in their hands. In the meantime, the local authorities having apprehended from the excitement caused by Mr. Clarke's conduct, that there might be a breach of the peace had taken measures to guard the falls by police from forcible entry by natives within the prohibited hours. The police ordered the Mysoreans not to enter the bath as there might be a breach of the peace if the Europeans should come to bathe. They were not heeded. One Constable was, it is said, pushed aside. While they were in possession of the bath, Mr. Clarke and other Europeans arrived for a bath, when the Sub-Magistrate ordered the Dewan's people to disperse lest there should be a riot from the Europeans insisting on their right. This too had no effect. The Europeans were then advised to retire to avoid a disturbance and they did retire without having their usual morning bath. The Mysoreans were subsequently charged with being a criminal assembly and with rioting and put on their trial before an English Joint-Magistrate indented from another division to the exclusion of a competent native magistrate on the spot. Mr. Henry, the trying Magistrate, found them guilty of the offences charged and concluded his judgment as follows :—

"Though the riot was only a little more than technical one, I consider the conduct of the accused should be visited with a severe punishment in having wantonly broken through a rule or custom which had hitherto worked harmoniously and which had reconciled to the satisfaction of all parties the contending rights and privileges of the Europeans and Natives in regard to the use of the waterfall in having set an example likely to lead to constant difficulties and likely to imperil the future maintenance of the public peace in the locality.

I accordingly sentence each of the accused to four months' imprisonment and direct that for the first month it be simple and for the remaining three rigorous. I further direct under Section 106 C. C. P. that each of the accused do execute a bond personally for Rs. 50 with surety each in the same sum to keep the peace for two months."

The sentence has been set aside on appeal to the High Court which has taken sharp notice of the conduct of the officials in the matter. The magistrate's prohibition is declared to be illegal and the allegations against the defendants that they came armed and with a premeditated object to cause a disturbance in the case of resistance to their right of bathing were disproved. In fact, the connection which to Mr. Henry's mind existed between the meeting and the conduct of the Dewan's servants the next day was not established, and the High Court expressed astonishment at the severity of sentences for a riot which Mr. Henry himself had the sense of calling a technical one. The incidents are of a most extraordinary kind and have been condemned by all fairminded judges. We are glad to find that Anglo-Indian journals are at one with the native press in censuring the local officials.

The remarks of the Pioneer are conceived in admirable spirit. It writes :—

"The inhabitants of such a place—and it is a mere village—are presumably members of the Brahmin sect, whose stronghold is in this part of the country, and whose practice it is to bathe much and early, in sacred waters particularly. We cannot wonder that they should dislike an order from the Magistrate forbidding any of them to bathe before ten o'clock. It is natural that the half-dozen officials and planters should like their morning bath in the waterfalls too, and should prefer to enjoy it in privacy: but looking to the religious associations connected with the waters the presence of the European is probably even more obnoxious to the Brahmin than that of the Brahmin is to the European. The former too has been in occupation, we suppose, for centuries, and if it was a question of adjusting the matter by a compromise, the small society of Europeans should certainly have been the party to give way. But to settle the difficulty by a magisterial order forbidding natives to bathe in their own pools until well on in the day is an exercise of summary authority which is out of keeping with the times, even when the scene is a far off nook in the Western Ghats in the remotest district of the Madras Presidency."

SOCIAL REFORM AT THE POINT OF THE BAYONET.

THE Morning Post is a valuable journal and knows it—as we find from the occasionality of its doles to its contemporaries of inferior chronological status—the weekly beggars, we mean—at any rate, the weakly ones like ourself. We had formerly occasion to notice the imperfections and lapses which marred the usefulness of the new enterprise. We have since remarked a change, and now it is, so far as we have had opportunities of judging, an admirably conducted journal. As such, it cannot fail to influence the current of public opinion and the course of legislation and administration. All the more is it incumbent on its brethren to warn it, in a friendly spirit, against any dangerous view to which it may show a leaning. One of the recent issues of the paper contains a well written leader on the topic of the hour, "Child-wives." The writer speaks with just horror of the barbarous custom of taking infants to bed, and expresses honest scorn of the apologists of the brute who, in exacting his fancied superior conjugal rights, tortured the poor girl he called his wife to death. "'Child-wife,'" he exclaims, "what an unnatural combination these two words make: the pen almost refuses to write them." We are in thorough accord with him in his view of the law. It is the view taken by Mr. Justice Wilson at the Sessions trial of Harimohan Maiti in the High Court. To that view we gave our humble support, without any reservation. We have also advocated the raising of the age of consent. Although averse from legislation on social questions, indeed jealous of the interference of a foreign Government with the private life and social arrangements of the people, we think that, as the Indian Penal Code had already established an arbitrary limit of age, it is but just that that limit should be altered to suit altered conditions. When an existing law, itself imposed by a foreign Government, and carrying no higher sanction than the will of the powerful stranger might give,—when such a law has been found by experience to work harm, it is simply the obstinacy of barbarism to stick to it. So far we are in the same boat with the reformers headed by Mr. Malabari and Dewan Raghunath Row. We do not mention the European philanthropists advisedly. Their alliance is not of the best. They have no locus standi, and their connection is a source of weakness rather than of strength to the cause of Reform. European newspapers in India must of course treat of the subject, as European officials form their judgments on it. Even so has the Allahabad paper written. Now, with the ultimate aims of the Morning Post there is no manner of quarrel. Nor is it any definite proposition launched by it that we take exception to. Our complaint is against the modus operandi. We object to the plan of campaign for carrying out the object. We cannot regard the new propaganda with unconcern. The complacent confidence with which the writer would push legislative action—the spirit of jaunty Britishism in which the article is concluded—alarms us. The argument put forward for legislation instantly, is, to our judgment and experience, fraught with danger to governors and governed. The matter seems to our contemporary's leader-writer the simplest imaginable, and he chides the old women of the Government of India much in the style in which the Prince of Publicists, Mr. Thaddeus Delane, once rebuked a Lord High Admiral and a Napier into the bargain.

They were friends, the literary man and the sailor, and corresponded with one another. In the last great European war in which England took part—and a conspicuous part it was—when the people of England were chafing under the inaction, in the Baltic Sea, far from the mouth of the Neva, of the greatest fleet that ever left Britain's shores, the great editor, disappointed of his hopes, equally as a friend, a journalist, and an Englishman, of daily chronicling the victories of England—bombardments and captures of the enemy's fleets and forts—urged his correspondent to show fight and prove his mettle—to make one effort to sustain the honour of the British Navy which had never been consigned to such idle cruising or such make-believe reconnoitring, in front of the enemy, as then under the Admiral's command. Apologies were sure to be made, of course, for delay and inaction, demonstrating by the clearest logic upon unquestionable facts that everything was going, on famously and that Nelson himself would, under the circumstances, have been content to admire the fortifications of Cronstadt without trying their strength by cannon-ball. No editor was ever deceived by such chaff, much less Jupiter himself of Printing House Square. He anticipated excuses and answered them with true Jovine haughtiness and tranchant scorn, saying—"Difficulties? Any old woman may make difficulties." Referring to an eminent statesman of the time, Sydney Smith once said that the family of the Dukes of Bedford were up to any enterprise, that any one of the race would at a moment's notice take up the command of the Channel Fleet. Editors are by virtue of office as great heroes as the Russels by virtue of blood. Mr. Delane almost fancied he could by a wave of his quill bring down to surrender at discretion the Russian garrison of the chain of forts protecting the passage to the Russian capital.

After thirty six years, that lofty selfconsciousness reappears in the far East, in our Allahabad brother's lecture against the faint-heartedness and timid hesitation of the men entrusted with the government of this Empire in striking a decisive blow for the conquest of barbarism. Says our contemporary:—

"Of what, we would ask, are the responsible authorities afraid in this matter which renders them unwilling to deal with it? A short and intelligible Act, a few sharp and equally intelligible sentences on offenders of the highest attainable rank, and the whole thing would be done. Some wisecracks, who are scared by the bugbears of their own fancy, may doubt the expediency of this prompt and decisive method of legislation. It is hardly probable that the natives of India will indulge in another mutiny for several generations: the lesson taught by the events of 1857 will not fade so rapidly from the minds of Englishmen, Hindu, or Mahomedan. That there will be an excited appeal against the action of Government which will be construed into an attack on the religion and social life of the people, there can be no doubt. But it will die of inanition."

This light-heartedness amazes and alarms us. No more dangerous advice could be given than is compressed in the few sentences just quoted. It is bad enough that an influential journal should commit itself to it. But our contemporary is by no means alone. There are signs that the view is shared by other publicists, of more as well as less influence.

The above has been in type for some weeks for want of space. Since it was written we have been learning day after day of the steady progress of Mr. Malabari's mission in England. The Oracle—we mean the Times—has spoken and a formidable Committee has been formed of the highest Indian authorities including almost all the Past Masters and Past Grand Masters of Indian state-craft—for actively reforming the social institutions of the Hindus.

THE GOLD FEVER IN BENGAL.

With whatever derisive incredulity rivals may regard the claims of the Western capital to be in all respects Primus in Indis, all must readily acknowledge that Bombay is facile princeps in commercial activity, from substantive business and transactions above board down to forms of speculation undistinguishable from gambling. In the latter, her experience has been long and wide. She has sinned and suffered. According to our proverb, the patient of one day is the physician of another. The exploiters of Back Bay Reclamation and heroes of time bargains in opium and cotton are entitled to a respectful hearing from us of the East who are just now passing through our sudden gold paroxysm. Accordingly, we quote the Bombay Gazette:—

"On the whole, the ruin gauge betting in Bombay, which has lately been put down by legislation, seemed to offer a less risky means of speculation. There was at least a shower of rain to gamble upon. But in the case of these Bengal mining companies, which are springing up day after day, it is doubtful if there is anything so substantial even as that. The only question now is, how long the gamble can be kept up. Excitement feeds on excitement, and cannot last for ever. Sober moments must come by and by, and then we may prepare for a rushing down as rapid as the rushing up has been. Meanwhile, some one must be making a good deal of money, which is the same thing as saying that before accounts have been finally settled, some one must lose a good deal."

The use of the grammatical singular number is a piece of literary urbanity only. Not some "one" has been making money, but more "ones" than one—a syndicate, a conclave, more properly speaking a cabal—probably more cabals than one. These things are not done singly, though the originator and moving spirit be one. This master-mind is comparatively powerless without supporters and agents and emissaries. He organises a confederacy—a small but compact body of men who work in concert without often seeming to know one another, unless by accident or in the veriest way of business. As in the French theatre they have claqueurs, so in auctions there are puffers. The Turf is notorious for its mysteries, of which we get glimpses when the high priests who guard them or their creatures fall out among themselves. The more important Race on'Change too has its own rites and peculiarities. The stock market indeed is a regular "Zoo" or rather an extensive park, having, besides the deer and smaller game without number, not only bulls and bears but also wolves and hyenas, foxes and curs, with a lion or tiger at the head, or two perhaps, where the constitution is of the nature of a dual sovereignty such as was supposed to exist in certain states like Bhootan, Siam, &c. These all prey upon the unwary who may be tempted to stray into their inviting well watered precincts and romantic shades, and hunt their victims into one another's hands. It would not matter so much if "some one" only—literally one—lost even a good deal, provided he could well afford the loss, and provided specially he had been sinner enough. If one or any of the confederates lost, he or they would be served right. Sometimes they do—by over-avarice. There is a principle of retribution in all evil, demoralising those who voluntarily engage in it, until, in the continual indulgence of an illegitimate passion, they lose their wits and plunge deeper and deeper, to be ultimately lost. Those who retain sufficient self-command, make hay in hot haste in the brief half-hour of sun-shine, and bundle off their crop,

"And leave the world to darkness and to"— the dupes. These poor fellows ill deserve their fate, except for their folly—their faith in the undeserving—and can bear it worse. It is the trustful poor investors who are taken in by large promises under the sanction of respectable names that are really the objects of pity. How many of the poor become poorer—how many are utterly ruined—how many widows and orphans come to want bread—with the inevitable crash of every "bogus" business or inflated enterprise, be it a South Sea or a Mississippi Bubble, a Railway Mania or a Gold Fever!

In past centuries, men were tempted by myths of the main—Eldorados and perennial Pagoda harvesting beyond the sea. Nowadays, people are more prosaic minded though not less credulous, and any cismarine cock and bull story whose scene is laid on terra firma—say a scheme for shearing pigs or brick-making without straw—will arrest men engaged in —the madding crowd's ignoble strife.

Endless are the matter-of-fact business at home, at one's very door, daily appealing to investors, which for invention might stagger a Swift or a Defoe, for they are many of them more romantic than the quest of the Golden Fleece.

The earth hath bubbles, as the water hath,
And these are of them.

Rules and conditions relating to Scholarships instituted by the Gilchrist Educational Trust for the benefit of Natives of India.

[These Scholarships are open to Women upon exactly the same conditions as to Men.]

1. Three Scholarships of the value of £200 per annum will be awarded, one every year, to candidates who are natives of India (within the meaning of section 6* of the Statute 33 Vict., cap. 3), or of the "Native States" of India. They shall each be tenable for three years at any University or any Science or Technical College in Europe (approved by the Trustees in each case), on condition that the scholar shall undertake to go through the course and pass the examinations necessary for obtaining a definite Science degree or diploma as may be prescribed by the Trustees. The nomination to these scholarships will rest with the Universities of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay in rotation, subject to the conditions hereinafter specified.

2. A scholarship will be given every third year on like conditions, the nomination of suitable candidates for which will rest with the Universities of the Punjab and Allahabad jointly. Each of these Universities may submit to the Government of India the name of one candidate, and the actual nomination to the scholarship shall be made from the names submitted by the Government of India.

3. The scholarships will be given (during the next few years) in the following rotation:—

1891	...	Calcutta, Punjab and Allahabad.
1892	...	Bombay.
1893	...	Madras.
1894	...	Calcutta, Punjab and Allahabad.
1895	...	Bombay.
1896	...	Madras.

4. (a) Each University shall make its nomination from among the more distinguished of its graduates of the three preceding years, who shall not be more than 22 years of age on the 1st of July in the year in which the scholarship is awarded. Of these, that graduate shall be selected who has done especially well in Science or Mathematics and is desirous of pursuing—and is most likely to benefit by—a further course of scientific study in Europe. Provided that no person holding a Government of India Scholarship, tenable in England, shall be eligible, or shall continue to hold a Gilchrist Scholarship, after he has accepted a Government of India Scholarship.

(b) Probably the results of the examinations of the three preceding years will be a sufficient guide to the University in making the selection; but it will be open to each University to consider whether a special examination shall be held, although the Trustees hope that this will be avoided, if possible. If a special examination is held, all the necessary arrangements for it must be made by the University holding it; but the regulations which any University may propose to lay down in regard to such examinations must receive the previous approval of the Gilchrist Trustees. No examination should be held later than the month of June in any year, it being essential that all nominations should be made so as to afford the scholar nominated a sufficient interval to complete his arrangements and to reach England in time for the Autumn term at the Universities and Colleges. The candidates for the special examinations, when such examinations are held, must be graduates of proved ability, selected by the Vice-Chancellor on the report of the Syndicate or governing body, who will in their turn be guided by the opinion of the Professors and Examiners.

5. Every candidate for a scholarship will be required to satisfy the Vice-Chancellor of the University as to his good conduct, his knowledge of the English language, his physical capacity to undergo the course of life and study which he will have to follow in Europe: he must also satisfy him of his intention, if successful, to proceed to England forthwith, and to reside in Europe for a period of three years, unless compelled to return sooner by ill-health or some other cause which may seem sufficient to the Gilchrist Trustees.

6. Each scholar will be provided by the Government of India with a free passage to England. The Gilchrist Trust will provide a return passage (at the end of the three years) at a cost not exceeding £50, provided that the scholar shall have fulfilled the conditions of his scholarship; but the scholar will not be entitled to claim any difference between the actual cost of passage and the amount above named.

7. Each scholar must enter into a written engagement to submit to such regulations as may from time to time be issued by the Gilchrist Trustees for the guidance of the scholars.

8. The tenure of the scholarships will be strictly dependent on good conduct in Europe, and on satisfactory progress being made in study. The Gilchrist Trustees reserve to themselves the right of finally deciding whether a scholar has or has not committed a breach of the rules and conditions on which his scholarship is held, as also all questions which may from time to time arise, whether expressly provided for in the rules and regulations or not. They further reserve to themselves the power of altering the conditions of the scholarships, or of altogether withdrawing them, if they shall think fit. Due notice of any alterations will be given, and changes will not be made in such a manner as to affect the interests of students already appointed to scholarships.

On the nomination of a scholar being completed, the University or the Government of India (as the case may be) nominating him should communicate his name and address to the Secretary of the Gilchrist Trust, 4 The Sanctuary, Westminster, London. If the nomination is made after examination, the number and names, &c. of the candidates from whom the selection was made should also be communicated.

N.B.—One of the Gilchrist Trustees will personally see each Gilchrist scholar as soon as possible after he has reported his arrival at the office of the Trustees, and will confer with him upon the course he may propose to pursue and the University or College to be selected.

Regulations for Gilchrist Indian Scholars in England.

(1) Every scholar shall, on reaching England, at once present himself at the office of the Gilchrist Trust and report his arrival. He shall be provided with an official certificate of identity signed by the Registrar of the University by which he is nominated, or by a Secretary or Under-Secretary to Government.

(2) Every scholar shall, on arriving in England, submit for the approval of the Gilchrist Trustees a statement showing the general course of study he proposes to follow; and specifying the University or College to which he proposes to proceed. After consideration of such statement, the Trustees will decide at what University, or Science or Technical college in Europe the scholarship shall be tenable, and will prescribe the course to be gone through and the degree or diploma to be obtained. Every scholar shall at once take steps to enter himself at the University or College which the Trustees shall have approved. The course finally prescribed by the Trustees shall not be changed without their sanction.

(3) Every scholar shall, at the end of each University or College term, send to the Secretary of the Gilchrist Trust a certificate from the proper University or College authority, showing that his residence, conduct, and progress in study have been satisfactory during the term.

(4) Every scholar shall at all times obey such instructions as he may receive from the Gilchrist Trustees or their Secretary.

(5) The scholarship allowance, at the rate of £200 a year for three years, will be paid quarterly, in advance, by the Gilchrist Trust, commencing from the date when the scholar reports his arrival in England.

(6) Every scholar will forfeit his scholarship, who, not being disabled by illness or prevented by any other cause which the Gilchrist Trustees may consider sufficient, fails to complete a residence of three years in Europe, or who is at any time guilty of misconduct or disregard of the orders of the Gilchrist Trustees. If a scholarship be forfeited, the scholar will lose his claim to a free return passage to India.

* The provision in the section is as follows:—"That for the purpose of this Act the words 'natives of India' shall include any person born and domiciled within the dominions of Her Majesty in India, of parents habitually resident in India, and not established there for temporary purposes only; and that it shall be lawful for the Governor-General in Council to define and limit from time to time the qualification of Natives of India thus expressed."

† This rotation is arranged to avoid, as far as possible, giving to any University a Gilchrist Scholarship in the same year as a Government Scholarship; but it may possibly happen occasionally that a scholarship may fall to be given by a University in the same year as a Government Scholarship.

NOTICE is hereby given under Section 351 of Act III (B. C.) of 1884 for general information, that the Commissioners of the Baranagar Municipality, at a Special Meeting held on the 23rd February 1890, have framed a set of bye-laws subject to the provisions of the said Act, and that a copy of such bye-laws together with a translation thereof in the vernacular has been kept open, for one month from the date of this notification, in the office of the Commissioners during office hours (11 to 5 P. M.) for the inspection of the inhabitants of the Municipality.

It is hereby further notified that, after the expiration of the said period of one month, the Commissioners of this Municipality intend to submit the said bye laws to the Local Government for confirmation.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

We have received from the office of Reis and Rayyet, one of the leading native newspapers of Calcutta, a most readable little brochure written by Baboo Sambhu C. Mookerjee, once Minister to the late Nawab Faridood Jah,

Bahadoor, Nawab Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa, which gives a graphic account of the Baboo's travels to and in Independent Tipperah. Written in capital English and evidently by a gentleman of broad views and enlightened mind, the work is decidedly a valuable addition to the catalogue of English written Bengalee literature. This book of travels should be read widely not only by English residents out here, but by our countrymen at home, for it teems with interest and teaches us far more about the fine belt of unopened country travelled through than any work of the sort written by an Englishman would have done. Baboo Sambhu Chunder Mookerjee is one of whom his countrymen may well be proud, for he writes throughout with the moderate and educated pen of a thorough gentleman.—The Indian Planter's Gazette & Sporting News. October 4, 1887.

If we have not before noticed Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee's Travels in Bengal, which was published some months ago, it is not because the little book is either dull or pointless. It contains, on the contrary, much interesting matter, though some of the incidents are over-weighted with detail in what is facetiously called a "little booklet." The author's view as a rule is, by the way, facetious: he is given even to punning; but he is also sentimental in the highest degree—"a naked Whiteman" hurts his susceptibilities; a Hindu girl, bathing in the river, throws him into an ecstasy of delight: "she had such large languishing eyes!" But he is nothing if not philosophical, and his reflections on this or that social and political subject are not without their moral. Mr. Sambhu C. Mookerjee was formerly Minister to the "last of the Nawabs Nazim of Bengal, Behar and Orissa" and afterwards Minister of the Maharaja of Tipperah. He is a man, therefore, of experience, and when he speaks his brethren should listen to him..... Travels in Bengal is a readable book, and it abounds in anecdotes which are often as instructive as amusing, and it is not spoiled by too many political allusions, though, of course some few have crept in.—The Pioneer, Dec., 1887.

CONTEMPORARY POETRY.

OLD.

BY THE REV. RALPH HOYT.

By the wayside, on a mossy stone,
Sat a hoary pilgrim sadly musing ;
Oft I marked him sitting there alone,
All the landscape like a page perusing ;
Poor, unknown—
By the wayside on a mossy stone.

Buckled knee and shoe, and broad-rimmed hat,
Coat as ancient as the form 't was folding,
Silver buttons, queue, and crimped cravat,
Oaken staff his feeble hand upholding,
There he sat !
Buckled knee and shoe, and broad-rimmed hat.

Seemed it pitiful he should sit there,
No one sympathizing, no one heeding,
None to love him for his thin gray hair
And the furrows all so mutely pleading
Age and care ;
Seemed it pitiful he should sit there.

It was summer, and we went to school,
Dapper country lads, and little maidens,
Taught the motto of the "Dunce's stool,"—
Its grave import still my fancy ladens,—
"HERE'S A FOOL !"
It was summer, and we went to school.

When the stranger seemed to mark our play,
Some of us were joyous, some sad-hearted.
I remember well—too well—that day—
Ofttimes the tears unbidden started—
Would not stay !
When the stranger seemed to mark our play.

One sweet spirit broke the silent spell—
Ah ! to me her name was always heaven !
She besought him all his grief to tell,
(I was then thirteen, and she eleven,) ISABEL !
One sweet spirit broke the silent spell.

Angel ! said he sadly, I am old ;
Earthly hope no longer hath a morrow ;
Yet why sit I here thou shalt be told ;
Then his eye betrayed a pearl of sorrow—
Down it rolled !
Angel ! said he sadly, I am old !

I have tottered here to look once more
On the pleasant scene where I delighted
In the careless, happy days of yore,
Ere the garden of my heart was blighted
To the core !
I have tottered here to look once more.

All the picture now to me how dear !
E'en this old gray rock where I am seated
Is a jewel worth my journey here ;
Ah ! that such a scene must be completed
With a tear !
All the picture now to me so dear !

Old stone school-house—it is still the same !
There's the very step so oft I mounted ;
There is the window creaking in its frame,
And the notches that I cut and counted
For the game !
Old stone school-house—it is still the same !

In the cottage yonder I was born :—
Long my happy home that humble dwelling ;
There the fields of clover, wheat, and corn,
There the spring with limpid nectar swelling ;
Ah, forlorn !
In the cottage yonder I was born.

Those two gateway sycamores you see,
They were planted just so far asunder,
That long well-pole from the path to free,
And the wagon to pass safely under ;—
Ninety-three !
Those two gateway sycamores you see.

There's the orchard where we used to climb,
When my mates and I were boys together,
Thinking nothing of the flight of time,
Fearing nought but work and rainy weather ;
Past its prime !
There's the orchard where we used to climb.

There the rude, three-cornered chestnut rails,
Round the pasture where the cows were grazing,
Where, so sly, I used to watch for quails
In the crops of buckwheat we were raising—
Traps and trails—
There the rude, three-cornered chestnut rails.

There's the mill that ground our yellow grain ;
Pond and river still serenely flowing ;
Cot, there nestling in the shaded lane,
Where the lily of my heart was blowing—
MARY JANE !
There's the mill that ground our yellow grain !

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

There's the gate on which I used to swing,
 Brook, and bridge, and barn, and old red stable.
 But, alas! no more the morn shall bring
 That dear group around my father's table—
 Taken wing!
 There's the gate on which I used to swing.

I am fleeing—all I loved are fled;
 Yon green meadow was our place for playing;
 That old tree can tell of sweet things said,
 When round it Jane and I were straying:—
 She is dead!
 I am fleeing—all I loved are fled!

Yon white spire—a pencil on the sky,
 Tracing silently life's changeful story—
 So familiar with my dim old eye,
 Points me to seven that are now in glory
 There on high—
 Yon white spire—a pencil on the sky.

Of the aisle of that old church we trod,
 Guided thither by an angel mother;
 Now she sleeps beneath its sacred sod—
 Sire and sister, and my little brother—
 Gone to God;
 Of the aisle of that old church we trod.

There my Mary blest me with her hand,
 When our souls drank in the nuptial blessing,
 Ere we wandered to that distant land—
 Now, alas! her gentle bosom pressing;
 There I stand—
 There my Mary blest me with her hand.

Angel, said he sadly, I am old;
 Early life no longer hath a morrow;—
 Now why sit I here thou hast been told;—
 In his eye another pearl of sorrow;—
 Down it rolled,
 Angel, said he sadly, I am old.

By the wayside, on a mossy stone,
 Sat a hoary pilgrim sadly musing;
 Still I marked him sitting there alone,
 All the landscape like a page perusing;
 Poor, unknown,
 By the wayside, on a mossy stone.

The Levee at Government House, Calcutta, has been announced for Tuesday the 16th December and the Drawing Room for Thursday following.

THE Lieutenant-Governor is nearing the end of his monsoon tour. Sir Stuart Bayley arrives at Rungpur to-morrow, and, halting there for two days, arrives at Darjeeling on Wednesday, the 24th.

THE tocsin of his parting rule has been sounded. He has been appointed to succeed Sir Edward Bradford in the Political and Secret Department of the India Office, and leaves Bengal, we believe, by the close of the year. Who is to be the next king? Several names have been suggested, but there is no positive information yet as to the successor.

MR. Robert Steel, of R. Steel, & Co., and Mr. W. H. McKewan, of Kelly & Co., have been elected representatives of the Chamber of Commerce on the Port Trust.

MR. Lambert takes leave from the 22nd September to 17th October and passes it in Shillong. Mr. Barnard, his Deputy, receives full charge as Commissioner of Police, and Mr. F. L. Halliday, Assistant Superintendent of Police, in charge of the Noakhali District Police, acts the Deputy Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, with the powers of a Justice of the Peace for all the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal's control and those of a Magistrate of the first class in the district of the 24-Pergunnahs.

WE are glad to learn from the Chamber of Commerce that the Bengal Distress Fund has made a grant of Rs. 1,000 each to the Districts of Moorshedabad and Jessore, to aid the people suffering from the inundations.

THE Chamber of Commerce has been assured that the Merchant Shipping Bill will not be passed at Simla but will be taken up during the Calcutta Session of the Legislative Council.

WE find a Barrister-at-law of some years' standing has been appointed an Honorary Magistrate at Chupra with only the powers of a third class Magistrate. In our own neighbourhood, Sealdah, approved native Pleaders exercise 2nd class powers on the Independent Bench of Honorary Magistrates.

THE last of the Civil Service Examinations under the old Regulations will be held on the 1st June 1891, in London.

THE following rule for the Orissa Canals, proposed in August last, has been sanctioned by the Lieutenant-Governor:—

"All low-lying lands which cannot ordinarily benefit by canal water shall be excluded by the Deputy Revenue Superintendent from a kharif lease of five years, or exempted from assessment.

Proviso.—If owing to extraordinary drought in any year during the currency of such lease, such exempted lands, or any portion of them, can and do benefit, the cultivators shall be liable in such year for the crop benefited."

GOVERNMENT has begun to open its eyes to the hardships by exposure to the sun to which seamen while in port are subjected. The following rules have been proposed under the Indian Ports Act, X of 1889. They will be considered two weeks hence:—

"During the months of April to October no European seaman or apprentice shall be employed during the hot hours of the day upon work necessitating direct exposure to the sun.

Masters of vessels requiring work to be performed in bilges, boilers, and double bottoms shall be responsible that such places are free from all dangerous and obnoxious gases, &c., before the men are sent to work in them.

Before sending seamen, apprentices, or labourers into the holds of vessels, the hatches of which have been closed for over 12 hours, precautions shall be taken, especially with vessels loading grain in the rainy season, to ascertain by lowering a light the state of the air in the hold. A rope shall be fastened to the first man sent down, and the same precaution shall be taken in any case where men are sent below to assist in the rescue of men who have become insensible when working in a hold, fore-peak, or locker in which foul air may have collected or noxious gases may have been generated."

The last is suggested by the recent deaths from carbonic acid gas in the holds of vessels.

AT the last annual meeting of the British Dental Association (Eastern Counties Branch), the President, Mr. Kirby, answered the question—What is the reason of the great increase of decay of the teeth of the rising generation?

"He thought that there could be little doubt that the increase of decay which was met with was greater than the increase in the population would account for. The Registrar-General's reports suggested that some part at least of the increase in population is due to the increase in the average length of life amongst us, and this in turn to the diminution in mortality amongst infants and children of tender years. In other words, in consequence of improvements in sanitary and medical science a considerable number of infants survive the diseases and dangers of childhood who would formerly have succumbed to them. Thus we have added to the population a considerable number of persons who if not actually weak, may be looked upon as scarcely equal, physically, to those who used under harder circumstances to fight through the battles of childhood. And if in the next generation there be an increase in the number of children who are the off-spring of such parents, we may expect to find a general lowering in tone and consequent greater tendency to dental decay. He also considered that another cause which had not received the attention it deserved was the influence of climate, which may be unsuitable to a special race; for instance, the children of English parents born in India often possess fairly good teeth, whilst the teeth of children whose parents and grand-parents have resided there are usually deplorably bad. It may also be fairly said that the children of English people born at the Cape, as well as the descendants of our race in America and Australia, have inferior teeth to our own."

Is that the reason why the British in India shew their teeth to the natives?

THE American Dentist denounces the use of charcoal as a dentifrice, thus:—

"When used as a dentifrice [it is] very much more serious than people would naturally suppose, for although as a cleanser of the teeth, it is very effectual and does no harm to them, it is very destructive to the surrounding tissues, inasmuch that it is entirely insoluble in the saliva, just as much so in fact, as so much steel filings, or powdered glass, and is about equally irritating to the gums. It becomes lodged about the necks of the teeth and creates a chronic inflammation that very often results in the loosening of the teeth and their dropping out of their sockets. Many people have thus lost their teeth which otherwise would have lasted them through life. They have become victims of a popular delusion, a delusion that we have tried very hard to dissipate since we have been in the country, for we find it very prevalent here. We hope that our admonitions will do at least some good, and will dissuade some people from a continuance of the use of this disease producing charcoal, for there could scarcely be anything really more injurious as a dentifrice."

CAPTAIN Jorgensen made an iron life-boat, named it Storm King and voyaged in it round the world, sailing from England to Australia. For this feat he has received an official reception from the Marine Board of Melbourne.

ACCORDING to a Belgian shipping paper, a steamer carried to the west coast of Africa 14 missionaries, 460 tons of gunpowder, 11 cases of gin and 10,000 casks of rum. Such is the way of the civilization of the day—such the means by which it is pushed to the unenlightened corners of the globe! Later on, another vessel, we dare say, will take there a Belgian Father Mathew or finally a Caine.

..

THE woman's-rights movement is not confined to the earth. It flies in the air. We read of an American Amazon, Miss Gladys Van Tassel, who travels in the air and mounts the sky. She is now performing as a parachutist at Batavia, having shewn her power and skill in Australia. She is expected in Calcutta during the "season."

..

THE latest American invention is an electric corset with alarm attachment. It not only moulds the figure, but, it is said, that at the slightest exterior pressure a bell starts a-ringing and refuses to be silent till help arrives. Let none of our European readers import this go-a-head nonsense into our unsophisticated country. Here, it might invite a crowd of people to bid for the fair one.

THE Statesman's Lahore correspondent under date the 14th September, writes:—

"There has, I regret to say, been another outrage, similar to the one perpetrated by the man Brookes, on the North-Western Railway; the victim in the present case was a widow lady, named Mrs. Murphy. Her statement goes to show that shortly after she left Rawul Pindree for Lahore at night, a European entered her carriage, and, notwithstanding her remonstrances, flung her out of the compartment. She lay stunned on the line with a bleeding head until dawn when she found her way to a village and thence back to Gujarkhan, where she received medical attendance. The story has, as you may well believe, caused considerable sensation in the station. The account if true (we are waiting for further confirmation) would indicate her assailant to be a raving lunatic. At any rate it seems strange that such occurrences should be possible in these days of efficient police agencies. It would, I think, be a good plan if the doors of the compartments reserved for ladies were always kept locked; the key, for the sake of convenience, being made over to one of the occupants of the carriage. Some such thing will have to be done if ladies are to travel by railway at night."

The Police has since reported that the account is not true, there being in the train no such person as the alleged assailant.

At the special request of the Senate, the Syndicate of the Calcutta University reconsidered its own recommendation for a year's disaffiliation of the Ripon College in Law, and reduced the term of suspension from 12 to 8 months from October 1890 to May 1891. The Senate was not satisfied and requisitioned a special meeting for considering the propriety of the amended resolution of the Syndicate. That meeting was held last Saturday, under the presidency of the Vice-Chancellor, the Honourable Dr. Goudas Bannerjee. There was an animated discussion of over 3 hours. The Hon'ble Mr. Cotton moved and Maharaja Sir Narendra Krishna seconded the following resolution:—

"That the proprietor of the Ripon College having admitted the existence of irregularities in connection with the institution, and having taken steps to prevent their recurrence in future, the Senate, while concurring with the resolution of the Syndicate that the management of the College should be censured for laxity of supervision, are of opinion that the facts of the case do not justify the recommendation of the Syndicate to the Government of India that the Ripon College should be disaffiliated in law from the 1st October, 1890, to the end of the current Session, that is, till the 31st May, 1891."

In support of his proposition, Mr. Cotton deprecated any severity in dealing with unaided Colleges. He was of opinion that "the resolution of the Syndicate went far beyond the requirements and circumstances of the case. He would admit that the management was to blame; but the penalty to be inflicted was far too severe, and would fall wholly on the proprietor of the College, who was really not to blame in the matter. The penalty would be practically a fine on him of from Rs. 10,000 to Rs. 20,000. If the Vice-Chancellor had known it, he was sure he would not have imposed such a fine. This was a very grave penalty on a gentleman who had committed no other fault than laxity of supervision. Another point was that it would be highly impolitic to proceed in this way against an independent college."

To make a point and give a hit,

"He alluded to what was done in regard to a Government College just ten years ago, when similar irregularities were discovered, and a very different penalty inflicted. When the Krishnagur College tripped in the same way, the resolution of the Syndicate was that the student should be disqualified, and the law lecturer was called upon to resign. This case was brought before the Syndicate of the time by the then Director of Public Instruction, and the Chairman of the Syndicate in 1880 was Sir Alfred Croft, the present Director of Public Instruction. The speaker asked if the action of the Syndicate in regard to a Government College in 1880 should not be taken as a precedent in the case of an independent college in 1890? Nothing would redound more to the credit of the Educational Department than if their officers would give every encouragement to independent and privately maintained colleges."

This called up Sir Alfred Croft to the defence of the honour of his own Department. He performed his part well, without any bitterness or disposition as if he scorned to take the advantage open to him. He simply vindicated the action of the Syndicate, both in the first instance and again on the last occasion in revising its original resolution, and laid bare the gravity of the offence committed:—

"The speaker then dwelt upon the nature of the offence in this case, which meant violation of the regulations of the University, and allowing candidates to be marked present in the official register of the college when they were not present. In other words the college secured candidates admission by means of false statements. The truth of the charge had been admitted, and the punishment was accompanied by a certain amount of censure. Honest colleges were in this way handicapped, and the difficulty of detection and immunity secured may have encouraged managers of other colleges to commit similar breaches of the regulation. But when such breach was detected and it was found that an offence was committed, not once but repeatedly, and there were circumstances showing a complete disregard of the rules of the University and the obligations of truth, it became plainly their duty to vindicate law and morality by inflicting such a punishment as to prevent the poison from spreading still further. In the first aspect there was the admission of candidates to the degree of the University by false statements; and the second a far worse one, that these offences were committed, and can only be committed, with the connivance and knowledge of the students themselves, which meant that from the time students entered the Ripon College, they were familiarised with arts of deceit, and instead of lessons of public virtue, truth and heroism, they were imbibing the atmosphere of deception. This case was different to the one specified by Mr. Cotton. Here there was systematic and habitual violation. In the case of the student of the Krishnagur College, instead of attending the lectures on Tuesdays and Wednesdays, he attended on Saturdays and Sundays, and the Syndicate even then showed their estimation of the offence, slight as it was, and which had no resemblance to the habitual and systematic offence of the Ripon College. Who was responsible for this deplorable state of things but the management, who, it was found, resorted to dishonest practices? They were confronted with a letter from the proprietor, who disclaimed all knowledge of the irregularities. The speaker fully accepted the disclaimer, but he wished to point out that the proprietor's disclaimer put him out of court and deprived him of being heard in the matter. The late principal of the college also disclaims all knowledge, so they have here irregularities running riot and abounding in the college, and no one had any knowledge, no one was responsible for them. The speaker could only say the management of the college as a whole was responsible; the charge was un rebutted, and the management had failed in its duty to watch over and control its students. It had allowed them to practise deceit, for which they were afforded opportunities, and thereby rendered them unfit to be affiliated to the University. The laxity of supervision had been a source of great profit and advantage to the management by filling its college rooms with students, and it must accept the consequences it takes up, and not escape the just penalty its negligence involves."

Mr. Tawney took up the cudgels in defence of morality. He surprised everybody by the exhibition of a gift of oratory which no body had ever suspected in him. Such a speech as his delivered in the House of Commons would have made the reputation and fortune alike of the speaker. Here the dispensers of patronage would be culpable in neglecting to strengthen our Chambers—weighed down as they are, sometimes of necessity, by loads of dulness and ignorance—with men of such fine talents and solid worth. The great Professor treated the business with academic though by no means pedantic railery. In a passage of manly eloquence, weighted with crushing sarcasm, which was cheered to the echo, he said:—

"In the course of a long career in the Educational Department he had often had considerable difficulty in getting students to attend 66 per cent. of the lectures on every subject, and he had always endeavoured to carry out the regulations, but he had never known Government colleges to adopt that drastic method which, for fear of giving offence, he should call the 'conjectural emendation of registers.' In many magnificent letters to magnificent Secretaries to Government the governing body of the University had always professed to be doing all it could to inculcate a spirit of truth, and he was certain there were not many present who wanted their sons to practise the conjectural emendation of registers. He did not think it would be difficult to pass from the 'conjectural emendation of registers' to the 'conjectural emendation of opium passes,' the reward for which was seven years' imprisonment. He pitied the Professor of Moral Science at the Ripon College and the Professor of Moral Philosophy if they had to follow the example of this sort of morality. He therefore hoped that in deciding upon this matter the Senate would not look to the question of pecuniary fine, but would return such a verdict as would be for the welfare of the rising generation of Bengal."

Sir Comer Petheram laid down the law that neither the Syndicate nor the Senate could deal with the matter and that it rested entirely with the Viceroy to disaffiliate any institution from the University. He thought the punishment recommended was not too severe for the offence committed and even went so far as to say that the College should not be re-affiliated until it was shewn that there was no danger of a repetition of the offence. He was, however, moved by pity towards Surendranath—who, by the way, had once before received a very different measure from the High Court. He ended by saying—

"There was no security that, at the expiration of the time to which the disaffiliation extended, the same thing would not happen again. The Syndicate had taken up a position of punishment and not of reformation. It was their obvious duty to go to the Viceroy and ask that this connection must cease till the proprietor, co-operating with the Syndicate, shows clearly that the offence will not be repeated, and that, as soon as satisfactory guarantees had been given, the order of disaffiliation might be suspended. Perhaps it was yet possible for the Syndicate to retrace their steps, and by not pressing their decision obviate what would have a ruinous effect on the Ripon College and a most disastrous effect on the University."

Mr. Monmohun Ghose took up this cue. He had been watching the whole business with lively interest as a great leader and a Parliamentary strategist. He now came to the rescue of the reputation of the Congress in jeopardy in its Orator, with this motion by way of an amendment, to wit—

"That with reference to a suggestion thrown out by Sir Comer Petheram of the desirability of satisfactory guarantees for the future conduct of the Ripon College, the Senate resolve that, without proceeding to the extreme length of disaffiliating the law classes of the college, the debate be adjourned for three months in order to see whether the proprietor of the Ripon College will act in such a manner as to justify the University in allowing it to continue its connection therewith."

Sir Henry Harrison, with his known tenderness for his old colleague at the Municipality, seconded the amendment and defended the cause of the Ripon College with his fervid casuistry. At last, the Vice-Chancellor rose. He had maintained the dignity of the Chair throughout, with scrupulous fairness to all sides, and now he summed up in a lucid speech worthy of his reputation. Then the amendment was put. Notwithstanding the efforts visibly made to secure support, it was lost on a show of hands, but a poll being demanded, it was carried on a division by 38 against 35.

This shews a distinct advance in the opinion of the Senate. The first resolution was carried by 10 against one and the second by 38 against 35. The whole matter has now gone up to the Viceroy for final orders. The Syndicate insists on a substantial punishment for the offence detected and admitted. The Senate will be content to let off the offender with a warning. The Viceroy will have to decide whether certificates issued on the condemned registers can be accepted as correct.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

WE rejoice to learn that there is after all no truth in the report that Prince Victor Albert has been suffering from malarious fever caught in India. Although circulated in so many respectable British journals, there was, it is now averred, not the slightest foundation for it. The British Press which early naturalised "interviewing" and has adopted other little Transatlantic methods, seems to be getting American day by day.

THERE is something the matter with the Ameer. The Civil and Military Gazette says that "the Ameer lately released 160 female relatives of refugees who were in prison at Kabul, and told them to go to India. They arrived at Peshawar on the 10th instant, and will go thence to their relatives." That has a bad look. The following is unmistakable and truly horrible!

"Colonel Wali Mohamad Khan, Post-Master-General, who was in prison on a charge of embezzlement, has had his eyes put out by order of the Ameer; and Diwan Nehal Chand, who was a Diwan at Kabul, has, owing to disobedience of orders, had the hairs of his beard plucked out, also by order of the Ameer."

Will not our Government stir at such doings?

THE Syndicate of the Calcutta University has ruled:—

"That within six months from the date of publication of the result of any examination, any person may, on payment of a fee of two rupees, obtain from the registrar a copy of an extract from the roll-book of the University showing the number of marks obtained in each subject by any candidate at that examination."

After the discreditable disclosures of late in connection with the marking of examination papers, the University could no longer refuse to give in detail the results of the examination of the plucked candidates when called for. But we are not sure that it is empowered to demand any fee for supplying the information. The only power on this behalf conferred by law is that the "Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and Fellows shall have power to charge such reasonable fees for the Degrees to be conferred by them, and upon admission into the said University, and for continuance therein, as they, with the approbation of the Governor-General of India in Council shall from time to time see fit to impose."

AN influentially signed memorial has gone up to the Viceroy for amendment of the Calcutta Municipal Act with regard to the assessment of residential houses and recovery of busti rates. This is virtually an appeal from the orders of the Lieutenant-Governor who refused to move in the matter after having passed the law. It is a voluminous memorial and concludes thus:—

"Your Memorialists therefore respectfully submit that they have shewn with regard to the assessment upon houses occupied by the owners—

1stly. That the principle of assessment laid down by the Act is a fantastic, impracticable and indefensible principle necessarily leading to gross injustice upon a very large body of rate-payers in Calcutta.

2ndly. That so far from this principle being supported by the English authorities, upon whom Sir Henry Harrison relies, it is directly opposed to all the authorities referred to.

3rdly. That if this principle of assessment is indefensible, it is a denial of justice to the rate-payers of Calcutta, to defer enquiry for a period of four years, and to subject them in the meantime not only to the harassment and injustice of an arbitrary and impracticable system of assessment, but to the payment of rates which, under this arbitrary system, are imposed; and which they will have in the meantime to pay.

4thly. That with regard to the owners of lands upon which bastees or houses erected by the poorer classes are built, the simple question is whether the owners of the land are to be responsible for the rate assessed upon houses which do not belong to them, and whether any advantage can be gained by waiting for four years to consider this question. If the principle is unfair and unreasonable, a lapse of four years will not change its character.

Your Memorialists therefore pray that should Your Excellency consider that their present representations are founded upon reason and justice, that Your Excellency will direct that such steps as may be necessary shall be taken for the amendment of those provisions of the Act of which your Memorialists complain; or should Your Excellency consider that further enquiry is necessary, that Your Excellency will not allow a period of 4 years to elapse before such enquiry is made, but will at once direct that a Commission be appointed for the investigation of your Memorialists' complaint; and that all further assessments under the Act may be suspended until the Commission have submitted their report."

We do not see how, under the existing law, the Viceroy can suspend the assessment operations in the town, except through the Municipal Commissioners, who too are powerless in the matter. Here is indeed a nut for the Law Member to crack.

THE Anglo-Portuguese Treaty has been the occasion of an unseemly disturbance in the Portuguese Cortes. The members of the Opposition hooted the Foreign Minister and even went to the length of assaulting Major Serpa Pinto. Business was suspended, and on the restoration of order, the Foreign Minister brought forward certain amendments to calm down the popular hostility. They had been previously agreed to at Dieppe by Lord Salisbury at a conference with the Portuguese Minister. How the amendments were received is not reported, but there was a split among the supporters of the African Treaty and the Ministry has resigned. Complaints have been made to the British Ambassador at Lisbon that the crew of an English cruiser in the Tagus were hustled by the crowd and insulted while ashore.

The political excitement at Lisbon assumed grave proportions. There was a serious fight between the police and the people. A state siege was proclaimed. The military were called out. Order could only be restored by firing on the mob and injuring many of them.

(OWING to the revision of the cantonal constitution, there was a revolution at Ballinzona, in the Swiss Canton of Ticino. It was a slight one, and was quickly suppressed by the troops called in aid, though not without the loss of a Councillor who was shot dead by the insurgents.

IT was reported early in the week that a German official decree promulgated at Bagomoyo, sanctioned unrestricted slave trade in that district, and that there was considerable excitement among the Arabs of Zanzibar. Today we read that a German official at Zanzibar has denied the official decree. At the same time, it is declared at Berlin that it was never intended to abolish slavery immediately in German African territory. This is a construction which the British public cannot easily accept, whatever may have been the intentions kept concealed in the Treaty. Meanwhile, it is reported by a Zanzibar correspondent that slavery is reviving along the coast to an extent unknown during the last thirty years.

THE masters giving in, the Southampton strikes have ended. The firemen and seamen had threatened to boycott the shipping firms which would not agree to their demand for higher wages.

TO force the employers to universal suffrage, the Belgian Workmen's Congress has resolved upon a general strike.

THERE was a meeting of the two Emperors, William and Francis Joseph, at Liegnitz on the 17th. General Caprivi and Count Kalnoky were present.

THERE is cordiality between France and Russia. At the banquet at Jouzac over the late French manoeuvres, General Ferron toasted the armies of Russia and France, and said that Russia could afford to disregard all coalitions.

A GREAT maritime disaster is reported. Lloyds' Agent at Hiogo telegraphs that the Frigate Ertogroul, belonging to the Turkish Navy, foundered at sea and five hundred of those on board were drowned.

A FIRE broke out at the Allahambra Palace, Granada. Fortunately, most of the buildings could be saved.

CHOLERA has made its grim appearance at Aleppo. It is also reported at Massowah and Tokar.

DEATH is announced at New York of Dion Boucicault of dramatic fame.

DR. Leitner is nothing if not combative. He has fallen out with the Joint-Secretaries of the Oriental Congress. We confess we do not see much chance of the proposed Congress being held in London this year.

THE officer in charge of the Paper Currency has announced that during the Doorga Poojah holidays "the Currency Office will be open for business as usual on the 18th, 24th, 25th and 29th October." We believe by the words "as usual" the Assistant-Comptroller General, Mr. Keene, means "usual hours" as on other working days, and not that all the employés in the office will have to be in attendance. Even then, the notice is inconsistent with the instructions of Government accompanying the order for curtailment of holidays. The instructions are:—"In all these offices (to be kept open during the holidays which will henceforth not be notified under the Act) special arrangements should be made, by contracting the hours of business, by limiting the work undertaken to what is really urgent, by granting leave to Hindu employés wherever practicable, and by utilising as much as possible the services of their non-Hindu fellow-clerks to minimise the inconvenience which may be felt by those who have hitherto enjoyed close holidays on the days which will in future be open." Mr. Keene's notice is proof of the spirit in which the order of Government is to be carried out by officers of his bent of mind. The Assistant Comptroller-General evidently thinks, that these four days not being public holidays under the Act, he is not to be bound by any executive order of Government. Government itself committed the mistake of making a distinction between the Doorga Poojah Holidays under the Act and under orders of Government. The continuity and sacredness of the twelve days being thus broken through, irreverent heads of offices and departments are free to ride roughshod over the non-public holidays. We have reason to believe that the Government of India is not committed to its order against the holidays, and is willing to withdraw the orders recently passed, if shewn to be unreasonable or unnecessary. The Comptroller-General—it is not Gay but Jacob who now rules the Department—has permission to close his office during all the days of the Dussehra vacation if he chooses. He had informed the Government that there was no necessity for his office to remain open and Government has left him the choice to close it or not. If the other heads of the excepted offices would be as reasonable and could shew the non-necessity of keeping their offices open when Calcutta is off business for a holiday-making, there is yet a chance of a full vacation. We hope the Bengal Government will not stick to its own, but follow the liberal example of the Superior Government.

We may here mention that during the last two days' holiday allowed in the Mohurram, the counters opened at the Currency Office did very little business. The work done was not one-fifth of that of the usual business days.

The late Mr. Atkinson—may his ashes rest in peace!—was for the full vacation. He thought that the saying All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy applied equally to office employés and to school-boys—in fact, to all men. He as officiating Comptroller-General predicted what has been found in the Currency Office, and if he agreed to abide by the instructions left by Mr. Gay last year, it was only to prove that for business purposes the Dussehra vacation was a real vacation and little if any business is done.

THE first portion of the Chartered Bank Fraud case still goes on. There is no knowing when it will end. The evidence has closed, and addresses by counsel have been made. The Judge is addressing the Jury to-day at length. If their verdict goes in the accused's favor, there is an end of the matter, otherwise the case will be locked up and reserved for the cycle after the vacation. For the presiding Judge has reserved all the points raised by the defending counsel. They are three in number and cut the prosecution at the root. Here they are:—

"First, whether the charge was sustainable; second, whether the confession was admissible; and third, whether there was any evidence to go to the jury."

Just as we are going to press we learn that the Jury at last unanimously gave a verdict of Not Guilty. The prisoner has been acquitted and discharged. His son's turn comes next.

THE Government of Bengal has recorded a highly appreciative Resolution on Mr. Holmwood's triennial report of the Registration Department for the last three official years. The value of this report in the eyes of the Government is enhanced by the intelligent deductions which Mr. Holmwood draws from the statistics which are collected in his report. His observations on the fluctuations in the registration of perpetual leases are pronounced to be of considerable interest and importance. He says:—

"There are two great classes of perpetual leases—those given by zemindars to their tenants and those sublet by tenants to others. These two classes fluctuate independently of each other, and the circumstances of each particular district become a factor in determining their variations. But as far as the first class of perpetual leases is concerned, a general rule, such as would be naturally expected, seems to be at work. The amount of land being limited, the settlement by zemindars with their rayyets in perpetuity has a tendency to increase up to a certain point, and then to steadily decrease as the majority of the lands become settled. This has actually been observed to be the case in the sub-district of Baraset in the 24-Pergunnahs, where the Sub-Registrar is the most punctual and business-like officer I have under me (which renders his office very popular), and is also a most careful observer and notes facts in connection with registration transactions in the most intelligent manner. He has observed a regular permanent settlement going on during the past two or three years between the zemindars and their rayyets, owing to the zemindars finding it difficult to make arbitrary enhancements or ejections under the new law, and the number of registrations under this settlement has already reached its maximum and begun to decline. I have no doubt that this same cause is at work in other sub-districts, where the usual stereotyped explanation is given, that the zemindars find themselves in straitened circumstances owing to a succession of bad harvests; but it is only in particular districts, like those in the Dacca and Chittagong Divisions, where the rayyets are prosperous and insist on obtaining some certainty of tenure, that these settlements are at all general."

There is a steady falling-off in the registrations under Sections 12 and 18 of the Bengal Tenancy Act relating to permanent and fixed tenures. The decrease is explained by Mr. Holmwood by the unpopularity of the landlord's fees. The increase on the other hand in the number of registrations of leases, mortgages and sales, is attributed to the indirect effect of the Bengal Tenancy Act. So far as the last year is concerned, it was due also, to a great extent, to the scarcity. While the operations of the Registration Department have been carefully reviewed and commented on in general, one remarkable fact remains without explanation. This will be seen from the following remarks in the Resolution :—

"While the aggregate value of property transferred by registered documents increased by more than 520½ lakhs of rupees in 1888-89, it decreased by more than 412½ lakhs during the past year. There was an increase of nearly 11 lakhs in the value of moveable property transferred, but the value of immoveable property diminished by more than 423 lakhs. It is unsatisfactory to note that no explanation is forthcoming of the wholly unprecedented increase observed last year or of the great fall in the year following. In former years fluctuations in these figures were not considerable, and it is an insufficient explanation to attribute them to general dulness of trade."

On the subject of Mahomedan marriage registration, we are glad to see that the reforms suggested by Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadoor are about to be adopted in practice. The following remarks are made on this subject in the Resolution :—

"The districts of Dinagepur, Pubna, Backerganj, Noakhali, Mymensingh, Bogra, Tipperah, and Dacca showed an increase in the total number of ceremonies registered, while the districts of Khulna, Rajshahiye, Rungpur, Faridpur, and Chittagong showed a decrease. The Inspector-General of Registration thinks that in the majority of districts the Mahomedan Marriage Registrars are slowly but surely gaining ground, and that in those districts where they do not do so, it is owing to their own inferior qualifications or to the active opposition of interested headmen and zemindars. Mr. Holmwood was lately asked for a separate report with reference to the alleged unpopularity of the Act, and he has given his reasons for holding that it is not in any way unpopular, though in certain places it is neglected and in certain others its effects are destroyed by the opposition of a few hostile zemindars, and the Lieutenant-Governor is inclined to agree with the view he has expressed. Some practical reforms suggested by Nawab Abdool Luteef Bahadoor, C.I.E., in a valuable minute on the working of the Act, have been adopted by the Permanent Committee and approved by Government, and they will be immediately introduced. The Act is at the same time to be extended, on the recommendation of the Permanent Committee, to the Town of Calcutta and the districts of 24-Pergunnahs, Jessore, and Moorshedabad. As regards the Qazis' Act, the Inspector-General writes that the 'Act does not seem to gain ground much, though wherever the Qazis are energetic enough to establish Naib Qazis and get hold of the professional persons who arrange marriages there is a marked increase in their operations. This is specially noticed in the districts of Eastern Bengal.' The Lieutenant-Governor hopes that district officers will show more interest in the working of this important Act in the future."

IN March 1891, on dates to be notified hereafter, there will be an examination in Calcutta, of candidates for appointment of Deputy-Collectors. The applicants must have passed the B. A. Examination of the Calcutta University, or be holders of satisfactory certificates shewing that they have received education up to an analogous standard, and of not more than 25 years of age. The age restriction does not apply to candidates who are already gazetted officers of Government. Those in the list of candidates registered for appointment as Deputy Magistrates and Deputy-Collectors are also eligible for the examination, provided they have not exceeded the age of 30. It is announced that "No person will be deemed qualified who does not satisfy the following conditions :—

I.—That he has no disease, constitutional affection, or bodily infirmity, unfitting him, or likely to unfit him, for the Subordinate Executive Service.

II.—That he is of good moral character.

III.—That he belongs to a respectable family.

IV.—That he produces a certificate of ability to ride, signed by a District Officer."

If these conditions were strictly enforced, the Subordinate Executive Service would indeed be an honorable body. But how many not of respectable family have crept into the service, making the administration a terror to the true respectability of the country. A candidate for the examination must apply to the Under-Secretary in the Appointment Department by the 1st February next with a fee of Rs. 10 and the required certificates. The medical certificate may follow, the fee for which is Rs. 4. The candidates will be examined three days—in English Essay, a classical language (Sanskrit, Arabic, Persian or Latin) or Mathematics, History and Political Economy, Literature and Philosophy, or Physics and Chemistry. The total number of marks for the several papers is 1,100.

Unlike the University Examinations, there are no passing marks. Nor, as in the Civil Service, will a certain number be accepted according to requirement. But,

"After the results of the examination have been ascertained, a list will be prepared of the candidates selected for appointment in the year 1891. The list will be composed as follows :—(a) the first four candidates on the list in order of merit; (b) two others, to be selected by the Lieutenant-Governor from among those candidates who have obtained not less than one-third of the marks; (c) two Special Deputy Collectors or Sub-Deputy Collectors selected by the Lieutenant-Governor for promotion. The names of these eight candidates will be arranged in a combined list in such order as the Lieutenant-Governor may direct; and according to the position assigned to them in that list they will be appointed to fill vacancies in the Subordinate Executive Service as they occur. Should more than eight vacancies arise during the year, the excess appointments will be given to qualified candidates selected by the Lieutenant-Governor.

Selected candidates, not already in Government service, will at once be employed as probationers on a subsistence allowance of Rs. 50 a month."

The admission of the B. A. certificate as a qualification for a candidate is a piece of inconsistency. If University Examinations are worth anything, why is a separate education examination instituted? This departmental Examination is the severest possible condemnation of the University.

THE examination for Sub-Deputy Collectorships will also be held in March 1891. Those whose names already appear in the Government Lists of candidates for Deputy or Sub-Deputy Collectorships and candidates selected from the list of applicants for registration are all eligible for this examination. They are also required to produce certificates of health, moral character, social position, and ability to ride. They will be examined in (1) Dictation and language, (2) General knowledge, (3) Drawing and Surveying, (4) Mathematics and (5) Law. Permission to appear must be obtained as in the other examination.

"The six candidates, who obtain the highest marks, provided that they have also passed in the first of the above papers, will be declared entitled to appointment as Sub-Deputy Collectors, and will be appointed to fill vacancies in that grade as they arise. Should more than six vacancies occur during the year, the excess appointments will be given to qualified candidates selected by the Lieutenant-Governor.

Selected candidates, not already in Government service, will at once be employed as probationers on a subsistence allowance of Rs. 30 a month."

TECHNICAL EDUCATION—THE NEED OF THE HOUR.

OUR approval of Mr. Mackenzie's education policy has given satisfaction to our contemporary of the Indian Daily News. Probably it has been somewhat of a surprise. But the day of differences on the subject of Industrial Education is happily no more. Liberal culture is no doubt a fine thing but education in arts and handicrafts is a necessity of the hour. For the rest, there is no suggestion nor possibility of the one being sacrificed to the other. High education has now sufficient securities for its safety, while the terror excited by earlier enthusiasts in the cause of practical education who were prepared even to smother high education in furtherance of their cause is become a chimera. The two may now march together, without any thought of encroaching on each other. On the contrary, they may best flourish as co-ordinates of the same system. This, however, was not the case before. There were extravagant proposals in respect of general education at one time and revolutionary schemes of technical education. High education came under suspicion and the entire policy by which it had made progress so far was to be abandoned. The Government, it was held, had committed a mistake and must atone for the mistake as far as possible by pushing technical at the expense of higher education. In fact the attitude of some of the exponents of the new policy was alarming, or at any rate created alarm. If therefore the native press did not take to proposals of such enthusiasts in the earlier days of the controversy quite so kindly as now, the fault was not wholly its own. But the heat of the past controversy is over. Both parties have outgrown their vehemence, and for some time past the interests of high as well as of technical education have been held in equally just regard. For ourselves, we have always avoided taking sides in the controversy. In the very first years of this journal, we remember having warmly sympathized with the views of the then struggling party of Technical Education. Where any advocate of technical education was betrayed into avowed hostility to liberal education, we felt bound to remind him of his mistake. We believe that the two should be fitted into one system. Mr. Tawney's idea of placing both under the direction of the University has our complete approval. The one as well as the other requires equally careful nursing, and the most effective nursing is secured by the University. With all the strong hold which high education has got in the country, it yet needs fostering and right direction. The Universities have, indeed, given a mighty impetus to its progress but, nevertheless, the time is not come to leave it without the support of the State. As for technical education, it deserves all the support that the Government and the generous public could give. Already, the liberal professions are overcrowded. The higher schools and colleges are attracting numbers part whereof should have been diverted to practical handicrafts, only if the way were fairly open. There are kinds and degrees of intelligence. There are aptitudes for polite learning as there are aptitudes for practical pursuits. In the absence of schools for technical instruction, all are indiscriminately flocking to our Colleges many of whom should not be there—nor would they be, if means of education suitable for them were provided. Already, the old prejudices against mechanical pursuits are giving way before the pressure of the new order of things. In fact, the time for giving our educational system a wider berth has long come, and our complaint of the neglect of technical education receives its edge from almost our personal disappointment. Our own province is daily being far and farther left behind by sister provinces. To-day it is a report of Nagpore that reminds us of our backwardness. The next day it is a still more brilliant record of another Presidency that puts Bengal to the blush. The success of technical education in the Western Presidency has been of a most marked character. The Technical Schools of Bombay are crowded with students. To many earnest friends of the new educational departure, nothing, we believe, was a matter of more anxious deliberation than the question, Whether means of useful training being at last provided, they would be availed of by the people in sufficient numbers to make them worth the trial? All such anxious fears have now been dissipated in Bombay. The experiment has been a decided success, and Lord Reay's strongest opponents must give him credit for the success of his educational measures. The students, we hear, are pouring in beyond the capacity of the schools for their accommodation. Additional classes and fittings and furnishings had to be provided, but the influx of candidates continued at a rate which made it necessary to publish advertisements that the institution was full. Full details of the signal success of the experiment in Bombay are going the round of the press, and we refer to them only to emphasise the contrast they afford to the state of things in Bengal. Probably, it may be said that a commercial and manufacturing city like Bombay possesses especial facilities for technical instruction denied to others and no fair comparison with Bombay can lie. Admitted, but what of Nagpore? And has not Mr. Mackenzie's province also distanced us in the race?

There is no good reason, however, why Bengal should lag so far behind. Is it not the wealthiest Indian satrapy? As for financial difficulties, they are difficulties in which every Local Government has a proportionate share. Bengal, on the contrary, is specially fortunate in having its education directed by a man who practically though justly holds the honored position of Education Minister to the Government of India. That Sir Alfred Croft's own province should have so long taken little part in the movement is to us inexplicable. That movement received formal sanction from the Education Commission of which he was a distinguished member, and whatever progress it has been making in other parts of the country dates from the time the recommendations of the Commission began to be carried into effect. It is about three years ago, we believe, that arrangements for practically carrying them out were taken in hand in this province as elsewhere. The arrangements here must presumably have made sufficient progress as the Department was sometime ago said to be on the look out for a suitable house in Calcutta for its technical institute. Some degree of alarm was created by a proposal to convert the old Hindu School into the institute. That proposal, whatever its origin, was indiscreet, and it was met with a storm of opposition. It was evidently abandoned, and well it is the dear old school lives. But since then there is not a syllable breathed about the proposed Institute for Calcutta. Does it hang fire for want of a house or are there more serious obstacles? In the meantime, however, the demand for practical training is getting more pressing. The Shibpore Workshops offer no adequate variety of training. What we require is variety on the model of Lord Reay's scheme, and it is high time a beginning was made.

THE INDIAN BUDGET.

THE Indian Budget Statement was, as usual, made before empty benches. There were barely seventeen members of the House of Commons before whom Sir John Gorst unfolded the intricacies of Indian finance. This practice has been condemned on all hands, but in vain. It is truly wonderful that, in the face of the disapproval which it has always called forth from supporters of Government as well as their opponents, it should be persisted in year after year. Under the circumstances a proper debate was out of the question. Mr. Bradlaugh, however, rescued its character by his able criticisms of the financial policy of the Government.

The Under-Secretary of State was at an extraordinary advantage in presenting his Indian Accounts this year. He was in a position to take all critics by storm. Never was a financier in a more fortunate position in laying his budget statement. For, it was a tale of unexpected and unexampled prosperity he had to unfold. The surplus of only Rx. 270,400 estimated by Sir David Barbour was by one bound swelled to an unprecedented net surplus of Rx. 1,870,400. We say net, for the real gain was more considerable. This was due to a rise in exchange. Had it not been for this favorable turn in the value of the rupee, the finances of India would have been, said Sir John Gorst, worse by Rx. 560,000 than they were expected to be by Sir David Barbour last year. Part of this was real loss, viz, the loss of Rx. 40,000 on opium, and of Rx. 320,000 on railway receipts from slackness of the export in consequence of the same sudden alteration in exchange, while a part was only apparent loss, namely, a sum of Rx. 200,000 for interest arising out of the proposed conversion of the $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. Rupee Loan into a 4 per cent. Debt. This, of course, was not really a loss, but in the long run a gain to the revenue of India. Taking these outgoings, however, into consideration, the true advantage, said the Under-Secretary of State, which has accrued to the revenue of India from the rise of 2d. in the estimated rate of exchange was no less than Rx. 2,160,000.

Sir John Gorst then discussed the two courses which must suggest themselves to a Government in view of such an overflowing surplus. One was the remission of taxation, and the other the restoration of the surplus which, he said, went by the name of the Famine Insurance Fund. The former course had never a better chance of acceptance than on the present occasion, but it was summarily set aside, and the second alternative commended itself to Sir John's warmest approval. He put the official construction of the Fund and justified his recommendation for its maintenance with consummate ingenuity and made a thoroughly plausible case for his policy of caution. He said:—

"The famine insurance was not a material but a financial insurance, and it was based on the rough calculation that the consequences of famine in India were to impose on the people a burden of Rx. 15,000,000 once every ten years. The fund was supposed to consist of a special surplus of Rx. 1,500,000; but, as the Government of India was a continual borrower for the purpose of making railways and irrigation works, the whole or part of the Rx. 1,500,000 had been employed for purposes for which money would otherwise have been borrowed. The special surplus to which he had referred had never been hoarded, or invested, or kept as a sort of purse which could be drawn upon in the event of a famine occurring. It had always been spent year by year. It would, however, be a great mistake for the Committee to suppose that no money had been applied of late years to the extinction of debt or the promotion of irrigation and railway works; for since the year 1886-87 no less than Rx. 3,440,000 had been applied to those purposes. He was not so sanguine as to suppose that after the statement he had made, the character of the transactions he had referred to would be properly understood. He had no doubt that the name of the Famine Insurance Fund would continue to be used, and that hon'ble members would still talk of the Secretary of State seizing upon the fund as if he were guilty of robbery; but, at any rate, the first duty of the Government, upon the return of financial prosperity, was to restore the famine grant. With regard to the salt tax, in which certain hon'ble members took so much interest, although it was a tax which ought to be and which should be removed as soon as that course was financially possible, he thought the figures which he had quoted would encourage hon'ble members and the Government of India to restore the famine grant instead. As far as the salt tax was concerned, he could only refer to the statements he had made by authority of the Secretary of State, to the effect that the salt duty should be considered as a temporary measure, and that the reduction of it should be effected as speedily as possible. He thought that from the statement he had laid before it, the Committee would agree with him that the finances of India were encouraging and satisfactory; and although it would be extremely foolish to indulge in visions of enormous surpluses, at all events they might contemplate the future with cheerfulness and hope."

Besides Mr. Bradlaugh, there were Sir R. Lethbridge, Sir Richard Temple, Mr. Key, Sir W. Plowden, Sir John Fergusson and one or two others, who discussed the statement. Sir R. Lethbridge was in the best temper with the Government after the successful issue of his labors in behalf of the Uncovenanted Service and had but congratulations for the Under-Secretary for the satisfactory condition of the finances. He pleased that magnate still further by indulging in an onslaught on Mr. Bradlaugh for his disapproval of the shifting ways of the Government in regard to the so-called Famine Fund. The other speakers aired their respective hobbies. Sir Richard Temple propounded the doctrine that India had the lightest taxation in the world, and wise after the event, thought that a highly technical expression like the Famine Insurance Fund would never have been invented if the Government could divine the perplexities it would give rise to. Sir J. Fergusson denied the heaviness of land assessment in Bombay or the inadequacy of the employment of natives. Mr. Bradlaugh's, as we have said, was the ablest and most elaborate criticism and were it not for him, there would have been no debate worth the name.

HOSPITALITY IN A HOUSE OF GOD.

SIR,—In connection with your sub-leader on the eccentricities of a man of God, I beg to relate a story of my own experience which is calculated to show in a great measure that, notwithstanding the thorough and threadbare exposure of the church by Luther, the state of Denmark continues still rotten, and, I am afraid, it will continue to the end of the chapter.

On my way home from office, some time ago, I, together with some of my officemates, was overtaken by a right good down-pour which meant to deluge us literally, if not quite over-flood. However, we took shelter under a church-porico in the neighbourhood of . . . which had already given shelter to not a few under the same plight. Fortunately or unfortunately as you may like to call it, this was a wedding day, and we found among others a man in frocks pacing up and down the landing place, parading his long frock-coat and shining leather boots, brandishing all the while a pretty little cane which gave him much more the air of an eighteenth century cavalier than an ecclesiastic. The gentleman eyed the multitude collected under his very nose with apparent displeasure and sent from time to time a furtive glance at some body or other which convinced all who had eyes to see of the mixed contempt and derision with which he regarded those uninteresting intruders. But we were not in a position to stand on ceremonies, the rain was pouring down in torrents. Shortly, we heard the low rumbling of a distant coach; and directly it came in view, we were most imperiously called to fall back and make a passage; the liveried coachman drew up, the brisk foot-men unlocked the door, and outcame the betrothed pair, seeking under the sanction of the church and its benediction the bliss and comforts of a wedded life. The party entered. But no sooner was the party out of sight, than down came the man in frocks with his cane upon the poor weather-beaten multitude, ordering them to clear out, each and every one of them, on pain of a bruised back or a blackened eye, even though the Heavens meant to rain fire or bring the world to an end. Cleared we all out, as there was no help for it, and preferred the tenderer mercies of an inclement weather to the hard-hitting blows of a mealy-mouthed and charity-preaching Tuck in frocks. But before parting I cried shame to the man, out of the fullness of my heart, saying, inspired as he no doubt was with the utmost stretch of Christian charity, he was nothing but a sheer disgrace to the frock he wore, to the platform he was standing upon, and to the religion he professed. The man was in hysterics—he bit his lips and gave indications that he would tear me outright in pieces, had he but the power.

And such men are expected to breathe consolation to the afflicted and teach erring humanity so that their souls may share the grace hereafter! O tempora! O mores!

JAY KRISHNA BANERJEE.

Calcutta, the 12th September 1890.

* * In the seventeenth century Defoe wrote the famous lines—

Wherever God erects a house of prayer,
The Devil always builds a chapel there.

Since then His Club-footed Majesty has evidently advanced in king-craft. He now carries the war into the enemy's camp. Instead of going to the trouble of building separate chapels to spite the church, he now, it would seem, tells off some of his followers for service in the latter.—ED. R. & R.

MONGHYR.

Jumalpoore, 13th September 1890.

A river accident took place the other day. The E. I. Railway Co.'s steamer, "Margaret," which was flying between Monghyr and Khagariah got aground in the sand. Fortunately, no injury was done to the passengers on board.

The reduction in the several departments of the E. I. Railway is now in full swing. The Traffic Manager Mr. N. St. L. Carter has been served with six months' notice of discharge. The services of Mr. T. Curtis, Accountant and Personal Assistant to the Loco : Superintendent, have also been dispensed with, he having got a month's pay in lieu of notice.

Three European and Eurasian clerks, a dozen native clerks and about a dozen E. and E. I. mechanics from the Loco : Department have already been sent away. This is solely for reduction of establishment. There is a rumour that some more will share the same fate.

Notice under the 55 years' rule is under circulation on the company's employees on the line.

Budmashes of the stamp of Benares goondahs appear to have made their appearance at this station. A Bengali Babu attached to Friend & Co.'s shop, whilst going home after closing the shops at night between 9 and 10 P. M., the other night, was waylaid by one of the above and struck with a bamboo stick. Fortunately, the blow aimed at his head escaped its mark and fell on his shoulder. The police had better keep a sharp and vigilant eye on them, otherwise it will be a source of annoyance and danger to passers-by at night.

This place has nowadays become fearfully and unbearably hot. There is actually a need for a heavy downpour.

PUBLIC HEALTH OF ORISSA IN 1889-90.

The Commissioner of the Division reports :---

The year was exceptionally unhealthy, being marked by an unusual increase in mortality in each district, as will be seen from the comparative figures given below :---

		Number of deaths.
		1887-88.	1888-89.	1889-90.
Pooree	...	27,833	18,460	43,767
		1887.	1888.	1889.
Cuttack	...	30,708	36,892	51,413
Balasore	...	22,772	20,751	36,604

It seems probable that the excessive heat of the dry season, the capricious rainfall of the year, and the high prices of food-grains, were the main causes of the general unhealthiness of the year. Want of rain in the early part of the year produced a scarcity of drinking-water, while dearth of food-grains compelled the poor people in some places to live on coarse pulses and unwholesome vegetables and roots. The consequence was that the number of deaths increased under the head of almost every disease in Cuttack and Balasore, and that heavy mortality occurred among the under-fed pilgrims who resorted to Pooree. In Cuttack district cholera and fever were mainly responsible for the high mortality of the year, the numbers of deaths from these two diseases having been 14,887, and 20,661, against 3,814 and 16,526 respectively in 1888-89.

In Pooree the largest number of deaths occurred from cholera, the figures being 20,342 deaths, against 1,793 in 1888-89. Under the head of bowel-complaints the deaths increased from 2,032 in 1888-89 to 3,109 in 1889-90. The Civil Surgeon attributes this appalling increase of mortality to the following causes :---(1) To the great number of pilgrims attending last year's festival with a very severe outbreak of cholera at the Rath festival, which continued on to the cold weather; (2) to the famine in the tributary states and in (Ganjam), which, as Pooree is at all times a favourite haunt with beggars, sent crowds of famine-stricken people, who are the readiest prey to disease, to live on the public charities in that town; and (3) to the constant presence of bowel complaints, such as dysentery and diarrhoea, amongst an under-fed and weakly population like the Pooree pilgrims and beggars. The largest numbers of deaths from cholera occurred in thannah Khoorda (6,932) and in the Sudder thannah of Pooree (4,691), and only 632 persons died from this disease in Pooree town. Thus it will be seen that the pilgrims as a rule died on their way to or return from Pooree. The following are the remarks of the Magistrate on this subject :---

"The fearful epidemic of cholera which prevailed last year seems to me to shew clearly how little it is possible to do with the means at the disposal of district officers. Comparative immunity in 1888 was attributed to exceptionally careful sanitary measures at the great festivals, but in 1889, with the same administration, the same arrangements, the same zealous officers working them---Mr. Allen most of the time, and Dr. Walsh all through, from the Dole to after the Rath Jatra---cholera slew its thousands: in fact from April to July there were 16,726 deaths. I believe that the truth is that in an ordinary year, when people are tolerably well fed, careful sanitary arrangements, as far as we can make them, may help to avert an epidemic. In seasons of scarcity, when great numbers of people are under-fed, on any great concourse of men occurring cholera breaks out at once, and the pollution of the water-supply, to amend which on the whole is in effect beyond our powers, preserves the germs of disease and protracts the epidemic throughout the seasons, or until most of those who by bowel-complaints brought on by chronic semi-starvation are specially exposed to it and have fallen victims."

There is much truth, I think, in these remarks.

The number of deaths from fever in Pooree district was also high, being 4,071, against 2,454 in 1888-89. The Civil Surgeon states that after the excessive rainfall, which accompanied the cyclone in November, fever was unusually bad, and that there was another bad outbreak of fever after the heavy rain in March. The number of deaths from small-pox also rose from 306 in 1888-89 to 1,135.

The Magistrate of Balasore is of opinion that the severe cholera which appeared in his district and carried off 12,993 persons, was indigenous and was not imported by pilgrims. The disease appears to have raged most fatally from April to July, and to have broken out simultaneously in almost every village in the district, though the Chandbally and Basudebpur thannahs suffered most acutely. Cholera pills were distributed, and Civil Hospital Assistants were deputed to afford medical relief. The following extract from the Collector's report suggests an explanation of the probable causes of the outbreak of cholera in the district :---

"The causes are not, I think, far to seek, though they take us back to the autumn of 1888. The October rainfall of that year was an almost total failure throughout the district, and, except in the extreme south, there was practically no rain in November. In their eagerness to save the winter rice, the rayyets used for irrigation purposes every available drop of water, with the result that by February there was little left for drinking purposes. In January, February, and March 1889 there was scarcely any rainfall. May, June, and July were also much below the average, as was also September. It is no wonder therefore that cholera took root in every part of the district, especially in Basudebpur and Chandbally thannahs, which are impregnated with salt, and where drinking-water is always scarce. It should perhaps be noted that these are two of the three thannahs that suffered from flood in August and September 1888. . . . It is certainly worth remarking that Jellalore suffered less than any other thannah. Here the people possess an abundant supply of good water in the Subarnarekha river."

In Cuttack and Balasore the progress of vaccination and the prohibition of inoculation have resulted in a marked decrease of mortality from small-pox, as will be seen from the comparative figures given below :---

Number of deaths from small-pox in--- 1888.	1889.

Cuttack	...	502	212
Balasore	...	474	182

Pooree alone shows a marked increase in the number of deaths from small-pox, the figures being 1,135, against 506 in 1888-89. In the town of Pooree vaccination is compulsory, but in the district it is optional, and is under the supervision of the Superintendent of Vaccination. In the town small-pox broke out badly after the November cyclone, and 54 cases were admitted to hospital. An extra vaccinator was appointed by the municipality. Out of 790 cases in which operations were performed, 684 were successful. In the interior, Banpur, as noticed under the head of public health, is the constant home of this disease, which is imported from the tributary states. Vaccination must be doing something to check it, and the Magistrate believes that frequent representations on the subject have resulted in the work of the vaccinators being considerably stimulated. The people of Banpur, however, are said to be singularly superstitious, and to regard small-pox as a direct visitation of the thakooranee or deity of that disease. Hence they regard any measures to check the disease as an impious interference with divine wishes, and refuse inoculation and vaccination alike. Apart from this passive resistance, Mr. Duke mentions that in small-pox cases the relatives are assembled in the house of the sick person, which is then, as far as possible, closed up from light and air while a poojah is performed over him. This procedure is certainly calculated to spread the disease. I have submitted to Government a proposal made by the Magistrate to introduce compulsory vaccination in Banpur thannah.

In Cuttack, out of 15,834 operations performed 14,746 were successful. The results of vaccination operations in both Cuttack and Balasore were satisfactory.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.---Rheumatism and Neuralgia.---Though the former disease remorselessly attacks persons of all ages, and the latter ruthlessly selects its victims from the weak and delicate, the persevering use of these remedies will infallibly cure both complaints. After the affected parts have been diligently fomented with hot brine, and the skin thoroughly dried, Holloway's Ointment must be rubbed in firmly and evenly for a few minutes twice a day, and his Pills taken according to the printed directions wrapped round each box of his medicine. Both Ointment and Pills are accompanied by instructions designed for the public at large, and no invalid, who attentively reads them, can now be at any loss how to doctor himself successfully.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

JULY 24.

(Present—LORD WATSON, LORD MAGNACHTEN, SIR BARNES PEACOCK, and SIR RICHARD COUCH.)

BISHAMBHAR NATH AND OTHERS v. NAWAB IMDAD ALI KHAN.

These were six appeals, consolidated by an Order in Council, from a judgment of the Judicial Commissioner of Oude of April 3, 1889.

Sir Horace Davey, Q.C., and Mr. J. D. Mayne were counsel for the appellants; and Mr. Doyne for the respondent.

Lord Watson, in delivering their Lordships' judgment, said the appeals were instituted at the instance of judgment creditors of the respondent, Nawab Imdad Ali Khan, one of the heirs of the late Malka Jehan, the principal consort of Mahommed Ali Shah, the last King of Oude. In all of them the same question was raised—whether a monthly allowance payable to the respondent by the Indian Government, under an arrangement made between the King of Oude and the Governor-General of India in 1842, was liable to be taken in execution for his debts. Mahommed Ali Shah had in 1838 advanced 17,00,000 rupees to the Government of India in pursuance of a formal treaty by which the latter undertook to apply the interest of that sum in payment of allowances to certain members of the Royal family and household, including his consort Malka Jehan, and their respective heirs in perpetuity. In the treaty those allowances were described as "pensions," and the persons entitled to them for the time being as "pensioners"; and on the failure of an original pensioner, and his or her heirs, the Government undertook to devote the lapsed pension towards the maintenance of a mosque selected by the King. Mahommed Ali Shah subsequently advanced to the Indian Government 12,00,000 rupees, which he intended to settle as an additional provision for Malka Jehan and her heirs. Being apprehensive that the lady or her heirs might, if the note or acknowledgment of the loan were issued in her name, be "persuaded at some future period, by evil advisers, to sell the note and squander away the money," his Majesty, by letter dated January 4, 1882, requested the Governor-General, instead of issuing a promissory note in the name of Malka Jehan, to "pay to her, and her issue in perpetuity, the interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, that is, 5,000 rupees a month, so long as 5 per cent. interest may be allowed, and afterwards such reduced interest as may be paid from time to time by the British Government." The letter made special reference to the guarantee or treaty of 1838, and the pensions thereby settled on the ladies of the royal family, and represented that compliance with the request which it preferred "will prevent any new guarantee being entered into, but will merely be the payment of a large sum of interest instead of a small one." In reply to that communication, the Governor-General, by a letter dated February 15, 1842, intimated his pleasure "in concurring with the hearty desire and wishes" of his Majesty, and gave the assurance that an order would be duly passed for their execution. The Civil Procedure Code of 1882, section 266, enacted that "stipends and gratuities allowed to military and civil pensioners of Government and political pensions" should not be liable to attachment and sale in execution of a decree. If the share inherited by the respondent of the interest on the loan of 1842, originally payable to Malka Jehan, be "a political pension" within the meaning of that enactment, the case of the appellants necessarily failed. The appellants argued, in the first place, that the allowance payable to the respondent by the Indian Government was not a pension, and, secondly, that if it were, it was not "a political pension" in the sense of the Civil Procedure Code, inasmuch as it was not a pension bestowed by the Indian Government in respect of political services or for political considerations. Their Lordships considered that the Governor-General in assenting to the King's letter of January 4, 1842 expressly agreed to apply the interest, arising upon the new loan, in augmenting the pensions already secured to the Queen and heirs by the treaty of 1831, such augmentation being subject to the same conditions and under the same guarantee as the original pensions. In that view, it was impossible to say that the increase was not a pension, or that the heirs of Malka Jehan, the present recipients, had not been recognized as pensioners by the Government of India. Although a settlement in the terms of the King's letter of 1842 creating pensions in perpetuity could not, under the Mahomedan law, be validly made by a private individual, the arrangement of 1842 took effect as a contract or treaty between two sovereign Powers. It was probable (although the point was not one which it was necessary to determine in the case) that the enactments of section 266 of the Code were not meant to cover pensions payable by a foreign State when remitted for payment to their pensioner in India; but those enactments certainly included all pensions of a political nature payable directly by the Government of India. A pension which the Government of India had given a guarantee that it would pay, by a treaty obligation contracted with another sovereign Power, appeared to their Lordships to be, in the strictest sense, a political pension. The obligation to pay, as well as the actual payment of the pension, must, in such circumstances, be ascribed to reasons of State policy. For those reasons they considered that the respondent's pension was protected from execution by the provisions of the Code, and they would therefore humbly advise her Majesty to affirm the judgments appealed from. The costs of the respondent in the appeals must be paid by the appellants.—The Times.

NOTICE is hereby given under Section 351 of Act III (B. C.) of 1884 for general information, that the Commissioners of the Baranagar Municipality, at a Special Meeting held on the 23rd February 1890, have framed a set of bye-laws subject to the provisions of the said Act, and that a copy of such bye-laws together with a translation thereof in the vernacular has been kept open, for one month from the date of this notification, in the office of the Commissioners during office hours (11 to 5 P. M.) for the inspection of the inhabitants of the Municipality.

It is hereby further notified that, after the expiration of the said period of one month, the Commissioners of this Municipality intend to submit the said bye laws to the Local Government for confirmation.

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

IN the absence of the usual Contemporary Poetry we have much pleasure in opening our columns to-day with the following bit of parable :—

TIT FOR TAT.

THERE was a cruel darkey boy
Who sat upon the shore,
Acatching little fishes by
The dozen and the score.

And as they squirmed and wiggled there
He shouted loud in glee—
“You surely cannot want to live,
You're littler dan me.”

Just then, with a malicious leer
And a capacious smile,
Before him from the water deep
There rose a crocodile.

He eyed the little darkey boy,
Then heaved a blubbing sigh,
And said, “You cannot want to live,
You're littler than I.”

THE Englishman's Debrooghur correspondent says that “owing to the outbreak in Lushailand, Mr. McCabe has been ordered there, and one hundred men of the Lakhimpur Frontier Police, under a Native officer !

THE great Brahmaputra, which a fortnight before was in full flood, in fact as high as it had ever been known for years—parts of the Bazaar, the neighbourhood of the cutchery gate, the Red Road by Dr. White's bungalow, and some tea gardens having been under water—has now dropped and is actually lower than it had been for months. So dry indeed the Britishers up there feel that they are crying for ice—ice of all things at this time in Assam—and have doubtless telegraphed to Messrs. Cutler Palmer, Kellner, &c., and the Great Eastern Hotel for large supplies capable of appeasing the thirsty soul.

WE learn from the Englishman that—

“A telegram from Jeddah announces the arrival there of 43,000 pilgrims from the holy places of Islam. The reports from the Governor-General of the Hedjaz and the Governor of Medina are favourable as to the health of pilgrims arriving from Egypt and Damascus. At Jeddah on the 25th of August there were thirteen deaths from cholera ; on the 26th eleven ; and on the 27th a like number. No new cases occurred at Revendix on the 24th and 25th of August, and none at Mardin on the 26th. At Mecca on the 26th no cases were registered.”

BABOO Mohendro Nath Bose of the Subordinate Judicial Service ends his service with the close of the month. That enables Government to reward Baboo Amrito Lal Chatterjee hitherto overlooked, with the appointment of Judge of the principal Courts of Small Causes, Magura, Jhenidah and Narail. It was recently rumoured that this prize appointment would be abolished with the retirement of the present incumbent. The hand of the destroyer has been stayed for the time at any rate. Baboo Purna Chundra Shome, Officiating Additional Subordinate Judge, Patna, replaces Baboo Amrito Lal, as Subordinate Judge, 24-Pergs.

THE Lieutenant-Governor records in the Official Gazette his thanks to Syed Mahomed Mehdi Hossain Khan alias Badshah Nawab, the eldest son of the late Nawab Looft Ali Khan, of Patna, for his offer “to make over Government securities, of the nominal value of Rs. 2,000, to found a scholarship of Rs. 5 a month and two prizes of Rs. 10 each for award to Behari Mahomedan students of the Anglo-Arabic School in Patna in commemoration of the late visit of the Lieutenant-Governor to that school.” The scholarship and the Prizes, as the donor wishes, will be designated “Badshah Nawab Bayley Scholarship and Prize.” The Collector will be entrusted with the administration of the Fund. It is satisfactory to find an inheritor of a rich patrimony thus proving himself useful to his fellow-men. This is an offer also to draw out the other two brothers.

AMONG the good points of Mhow is the Billiard Club open to all sections of the community. It signalised the completion of its fourth year with the usual annual dinner on the 20th of this month. The chair on the occasion was taken not by the President, Khan Bahadoor Khory, though he was there, but by Khan Bahadoor Bejonjee Sorabjee. Some forty-five gentlemen sat down, natives and Europeans, but whether they all discussed the dinner, whether, for instance, the Hindus merely watched the interesting operation while the others were lustily engaged in demolishing the mounds of meat and drying up the streams of wine, we do not know. The health of the Sovereign of the Empire was first drunk. After the loyal duty well-performed, the clubbers were re-called to themselves and their own health and happiness, the chairman proposing President Khory and the members. In the course of his speech Mr. Bejonjee expressed a wish to see Mr. Khory, one of the leading pleaders in that part of the country, called to the English bar. Is that to be taken as a hint of an intention on the part of Mr. Khory to go to Europe for the purpose? The barrister's gown would certainly become him, but he himself said nothing, contenting himself with stating the financial position of the club and asserting its claim as the only institution in that quarter which brought together the different races and sections of the community.

RAJA Moorly Manahar Bahadar of Hyderabad has proposed to his Government the establishment of a poor house and orphanage.

THE cost of the Forth Bridge is put down at £3,322,640. We are afraid le jeu ne vaut pas la chandelle.

PETROLEUM threatens to drive gas out of the market. The Town Council of Monmouth has decided to use the former for the public lamps in place of the latter.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

VESUVIUS is on fire, being in one of its periodical fits of passion. A large stream of lava is pouring down one side of the mountain. Another crater has formed and a second mouth was visible emitting smoke. Lord and Lady Dufferin have just returned from a visit to the volcano.

It has been calculated that "There are 3,064 languages in the world, and its inhabitants profess more than 1,000 religions. The number of men is about equal to the number of women. The average of life is about 33 years. To 1,000 persons only 1 reaches 100 years of life; to every 100 six reach the age of 65, and not more than one in 600 lives to 80 years. There are on the earth 1,000,000,000 inhabitants. Of these 33,033,033 die every year, 91,824 every day, 3,730 every hour, 60 every minute, or 1 every second. The married are longer lived than the single, and above all those observe a sober and industrious conduct. Tall men live longer than short ones. Women have more chances of life in their favour previous to 50 years of age than men have, but fewer afterwards. The number of marriages is in the proportion of 75 to 1,000 individuals. Those born in the spring are generally of a more robust constitution than others. Births are more frequent by night than by day; also deaths. The number of men capable of bearing arms is calculated at one-fourth of the population."

HERE'S a method—German—for converting wood into mirror:—

"The wood is first submitted to a bath of caustic alkali for two or three days at a temperature of about 175 degrees, Fahrenheit, then dipped in hydrosulphate of calcium for 24 to 36 hours, after which a concentrated solution of sulphur is added. After another dip in an acetate of lead solution at about 100 degrees, a shining metallic surface is given by polishing when dry with lead, tin, or zinc."

We hope this is no learned Teutonic joke against our excellent contemporary who with the self-ignorance of genius daily wears on its forehead the inscription Veluti in speculum.

JAMES BULLOCK, a simple boundary-rider of Salisbury Plains, New South Wales, received as a marriage present 2,000 shares in the Atlas Engineering Company, of Sydney. Instead of proving a blessing, these shares proved a curse. The Company was pronounced a bankrupt and a call of 8s. a share was made on the shareholders. Bullock loses £800.

DR. John Murray who recently visited the Sahara is of opinion that—

"Like other deserts it is an area of inland drainage, none of the streams flowing into the sea; and the evaporation is in excess of the rainfall. Its area is 3½ million square miles. The range of temperature is sometimes very great, the thermometer falling from 100 degs in the day to freezing point at night. In summer the prevailing winds blow into the Sahara, and in winter out of it. Being surrounded by hilly tracks the moisture in these winds is partially precipitated before they enter the desert."

THE following appears in a medical journal, the Hospital:—

"Probably the best time for the average civilised woman to marry would be any age between 24 and 26. It is not said that no woman should marry earlier or later than either of these ages, but youth and health and vigour are ordinarily at their highest perfection between these two periods. Early marriages are seldom desirable for girls, and that for many reasons. The brain is immature, the reason is feeble, and the character unformed. The considerations which would prompt a girl to marry at 17 would, in many cases have little weight with her at 24. At 17 she is a child; at 26 a woman. Where a girl has intelligent parents the seven years between 17 and 24 are the period where mind and body are most amenable to wise discipline and best repay the thought and toil devoted to their development."

These generalisations may not strictly apply to this country or its people, but they are highly suggestive to our condition.

THE following is going the round of the press:—

"An extraordinary cure is reported of an influential Chinese leper, who was placed in the body of a newly-killed buffalo and not removed therefrom until it became cold, and then only to be hurriedly thrust into the warm carcass of a second slaughtered animal."

There was nothing extraordinary in the operation. It is an old recipe known throughout the East, and is to be found not only in treatises on medicine but also in veterinary works. It passed into Europe too, we believe. It is perfectly worthless, of course.

FOR presuming to offer an illegal gratification to Captain Ellis, Government Architect, Madras, a Mahomedan contractor has been sentenced to three months' rigorous imprisonment. The Millennium may not be a myth after all. Indeed, when Commissariat men are squeamish and P. W. D. men actually refuse "tips," we feel ourselves within a measurable distance of it. The poor Captain is much to be pitied. He is a fish on a high and dry bank.

MR. T. Clarke, Coffee Planter, Tenkasi, thus explains away his assault on the native lady at the Courtallum Falls:—

"As the withdrawal of the complaint which Mr. Krishna Iyer made against me in connection with the Courtallum Falls incident and of my complaint against him has excited some remark, perhaps you will kindly publish the following account of what occurred. On the evening of the day before that fixed for hearing the complaints Mr. Krishna Iyer met me out walking, and introduced a gentleman with him as a Vakil whom he had summoned from Tinnevely, by whose advice he said he asked for an interview to discuss the subject of the complaints with a view to an amicable settlement. I referred him to Mr. Thompson, Barrister, of Palamcottah, in whose hands I had placed the matter, and who was to be in Courtallum the following day. Accordingly the next day Mr. Krishna Iyer met Mr. Thompson in my presence at my house, and discussed the matter for some time, but without result, as he required an apology, which I refused on the ground that though I admitted having touched the lady at the Falls accidentally, I denied any act which could possibly be construed into even a technical assault. At the hour fixed for the hearing we met again at the Joint Magistrate's Court, when Mr. Krishna Iyer waived his demand for an apology, and Mr. Thompson accordingly agreed on my behalf to the withdrawal of both complaints."

THE editor of the Tribune has published in the Pioneer the following apology in connection with the Warburton prosecution for defamation:

"Whereas I, Sitalakant Chatterjee, editor of the Tribune newspaper, offered, on the 6th September 1890, in the Court of Mr. T. J. Kennedy, Deputy Commissioner, Lahore, in the case for defamation brought against me by Mr. J. P. Warburton, late District Superintendent of Police, Amritsar, to apologise for the statements which appeared in the issues of the Tribune of the 4th, 7th and 25th June last, in respect to his mother, in any form he might choose to dictate, and whereas Mr. Warburton has not up to this time furnished me with any such form and whereas I am anxious to publish my apology as soon as possible in order to keep my promise, I do hereby declare that the said statements, though made bona fide and without intent to defame, were nevertheless wholly uncalled for and utterly unjustifiable, and I do hereby withdraw them without reservation and sincerely apologise for their insertion, and express my deep regret that I should thus have cast imputations on the reputation of Mr. Warburton's mother and hurt the feelings of Mr. Warburton and his children."

That does not end the prosecution. The case has been adjourned to the 1st proximo on account of the illness of the magistrate. We hope Mr. Warburton will be better advised and will not prove vindictive.

RAO Bahadoor Narayan Bhai Dandekar, Secretary of the the local Female High School, obtained a summons against one Shankar V. Kelkar, for defamatory articles in the Poona Vaibhab against that school, in connection with the case of one Luxmi, the wife of Mahadev Pandurang Agaste. Shankar apologised, and the Rao Bahadar, not intending to be vindictive, withdrew the prosecution.

MADURA is just now passing through a municipal difficulty. The corporation of 22 members has at its head a rather strong, if not very laborious or circumspect, chairman Mr. M. V. Appasawmi Naidu. After the usual preliminary quarrels, matters have at length come to a head. Eight members have boldly come forward to try conclusions with their Chief. After preparing a paper full of charges against the chair—which though alleging irregularity and wilfulness do not necessarily involve any one's good faith—they required the Chairman to convene a meeting for considering them. But Mr. Naidu would do no such thing. He would not let the Town Hall be degraded to a bear-garden. With a spirit that Warren Hastings might envy, he denounced the enemy as a set of traitors! He would not allow them the triumph of sitting as judges over him.

FOR appearing in his court in a state of intoxication, the Judicial Commissioner of Rangoon has suspended Mr. Reid, a barrister-at-law, from practising in his and the subordinate courts for a month. He was called upon to shew cause why he should not be suspended "for his grossly improper conduct," and pending orders he was not allowed to practise. In reply, Mr. Reid addressed the Registrar and offered a full and unreserved apology and promised never to misconduct himself again. The Judicial Commissioner, while not intending to be harsh, still thought that some punishment was necessary and inflicted one month's suspension, with a warning of a severer order in case of repetition of the offence.

WE doubted the competency of the University to charge any fee for any extract from the Roll-book giving the number of marks obtained by a candidate at any examination. The Statesman takes up the matter and improves it with its diurnal effulgence. The writer makes a distinction so fine as to be almost Hibernian, saying "As, however, the law does not compel the University to furnish the information, the question rather is whether it is at liberty to sell it, than whether it has the power to demand a fee for it."

To our simple thinking, the University, in the absence of any law to the contrary, has the discretion to supply the information, but it certainly can never charge any fee for other than the purposes specified by law.

The levy of the fee may be reasonable, but the question is, Can the University, under the present law, create a source of income?

THE Director of Public Instruction has notified that the Transfer Rules for Colleges, published in the Calcutta Gazette of the 21st May 1890, apply, mutatis mutandis, to the Law Departments of Colleges. We suppose, the University must adopt them, making the rules applicable to other than Government or aided educational institutions. One cannot help connecting this notification with the recent debates in the Senate and Syndicate over the Ripon College.

AT the last examinations, two Bengalis, one Burman and one Christian have passed in the second division of the Degree of Bachelor in Engineering; and one Christian in the first and six Bengalis in the second division have obtained License in Engineering.

THE Honours in Law Examination for 1891 will begin on Monday, the 2nd March.

THE next Half-yearly Examination of Compounders will be held at 7 A.M. on Monday, the 10th November 1890, at the Temple Medical School, Patna.

13TH December next has been fixed for election of Commissioners in all the Municipalities in the Patna Division in which the elective system is in force.

BABOO Preo Lal Dey, son of Rai Bahadar Kanyelal Dey, has been appointed to succeed the Jew millionaire, Mr. E. S. Gubboy, who has resigned his office of an Honorary Presidency Magistrate.

WE find that Mr. H. M. Rustonjee of the Independent Bench at Sealdah has been invested with the powers of a Magistrate of the second class. In Calcutta, as a Presidency Magistrate, he has full powers.

NOTES, LEADERETTES, AND OUR OWN NEWS.

OBVIOUSLY Kathiawar could not afford to remain aloof from the demonstrations of loyalty in other quarters in regard to the military defence of the Empire. Accordingly, we find the foremost states in that Province have come forward freely—as the phrase goes—with their assistance. The Nawab of Junagadh has offered to keep ready 150 foot and 50 horse, wearing the Nawab's uniform, drilled by his pensioned non-commissioned officers or by British ones, and going annually for a few days to Rajkote or any other neighbouring place to learn with the contingents from other states. The Thakoor Sahib of Bhownugger's offer is in keeping with the character of a Kathiawar Chief. He will maintain 300 good horses for transport, with men and gear, ready to take the field at three days' notice, the expenses of keep and recruiting during such service being paid by His Highness. While not so engaged, they will be employed in the work of his state. The Thakoor Sahib will also with his military Police assist in keeping the peace of the Province, in case it should be necessary to withdraw the British garrison of Rajkote.

THE Ninth Oriental Congress which was to be held next year in London with Sir Henry Rawlinson, Honorary President, Sir Mount Stuart Grant-Duff, President, Sir George Birdwood, Vice-President, and Dr. Leitner, Professor Douglas, Dr. Bullinger, and Mr. Hewitt, Bengal Civil Service, Secretaries, is not likely to be—that is, at the appointed time and place. Too many cooks without a controlling chef, or at least one commanding by personal weight the loyalty of the rest, have spoiled this Oriental curry. There is a split in the camp, caused by the irrepressible Doctor whose chief title to distinction among savants rests on his claim to have discovered the Dards. Dr. Leitner wanted to rule the roast—without caring to curry favour with his fellow cuisiniers. His colleagues in the Secretariat would not allow this. They were all equals, they contended, with co-ordinate authority. He said that he was not only one of the Secretaries but also a delegate of the founders of the institution at their meeting at Paris, when the first of the series of Congresses was held. That delegation, he argued, gave him the privilege of directing the policy and arrangements. The other Secretaries and others scouted the pretension. From private letters we knew how bitterly the contest was raging in Oriental learned circles in Great Britain. Matters at length came to a head with a formal letter from the other Secretaries headed by Vice-President Sir George Birdwood to the address of the two Presidents. The writers complained of Dr. Leitner and declared that unless he went out of the Secretariat it would be impossible to carry out the necessary arrangements for the Congress. In reply, they were requested to reconsider the matter and try to hit upon some modus vivendi. After fresh consideration they stick to their first letter.

The difficulty with respect to the Congress is augmented by the attitude of the French towards the Germans. It is believed that the French will hold a Congress next year in Paris.

DURING 1889, 171,103 persons died from cholera in the territories under the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, of whom 92,027 were males and 79,076 females. These figures give the mortality rate of 2.59 if the population be taken at 65,859,534 as in the last census report of 1881 (or 2.29 if the present population of Bengal be estimated at 74,482,274 according to the principle adopted by the Registrar-General of England for estimating population in intercensal years by adding the increase in the last census to the number in the preceding report) 2.81 and 2.38 respectively per 1,000 of the population. In the previous year, the mortality amounted to 111,391 or 1.68 per mille. The average of the preceding five years 1884-88 was 139,942 or 2.12 per mille, and that of the decade 1877-88 was 122,769 or 1.91 per mille.

The mortality from fever was 589,252 males and 512,269 females or a total of 1,101,521 persons. This represents a death-rate of 16.72 per 1,000 against 1,092,102 or a death-rate of 16.53 in 1888. The increase therefore in 1889 as compared with 1888 amounted to 9,419 or .19 per mille. The mean of the previous 10 years is 934,203, or a death-rate of 14.12 per mille.

OF the three modes of disposing of the dead—Hindu, Mahomedan and Parsi—the Sanitary Commissioner of Bengal gives his preference to cremation as undoubtedly the best and having everything to recommend it, not only from a hygienic, but also from an economic point of view. He pronounces the laying within the walls of an open tower—the Tower of Silence—as not insanitary, while interment he considers very insanitary. India continues as of old the teacher in civilization of the nations of the earth.

THE natives of India have been given by their European fellow-subjects in the country the reputation of being the most litigious people in the world. Herein our European friends only show their innate modesty. The passion for the law of some of them is not a whit inferior to that of any class on earth. It is shown in contrary, not to say contradictory, ways. They set the law in motion, taking shelter under, or advantage of, it, or they take it in their own hands, as they list. Their greatest dramatist has left the type of the most outrageous love of law. If Shakespeare sought in a member of the Synagogue for his representative of the most cruel hankering after technical justice, that was perhaps natural in a Christian of a period when the prejudice against the people of God was far more strong and rampant than it now is. Shakespeare, however, who could wed a fair daughter of Christendom to a swarthy Moor after a course of true mutual love, was too sublime a soul for the small partialities and prejudices which distract and degrade common men. A deeper consideration will vindicate his truth to nature and accuracy of fact in the Merchant of Venice as in Othello. If Shylock was a Jew, he was a European Jew.

THE two leading Faculties of Law and Medicine in the persons of two of their most eminent representatives are just now showing a characteristic example of Christian forbearance and learned moderation to the litigious natives. It is no great interest—no point of principle—on which these gentlemen are at loggerheads. They are fighting like Kilkenny cats over a harness. We now seem to comprehend the import of their national saying, "Nothing like leather." It appears that the great Congress orator, Mr. Eardley Norton, of the Madras bar, sold a carriage and pair for Rs. 5,000 to Dr. Lawrie, of the Nizam's Service, the same who has introduced into that native state the detestable practice of vivisection. The carriage and pair were sent and the money was paid, but Mr. Norton claimed an additional sum for the harness which, he says, the doctor had agreed to pay. For this difference, the lawyer has gone to law, having sued the doctor before the Superintendent of the Residency Bazar, Hyderabad. The defendant in answer, admitting the averments in the plaint, pleads a set off on account of breach of warranty by plaintiff in respect of the horses. That is, he keeps the price of the harness by way of compensation for the inferiority of the animals. A more miserable bagatelle could not be conceived for a couple of gentlemen to fall out about. And the case is characterised by the Anglo-Indian press as an "interesting" one—after Dr. Lawrie's description of his experiments on the poor dogs.

POLITICALLY, India is still a child. And the child is now making itself hoarse after the Parliamentary whistle. As it is just possible that, unable to stand the juvenile screaming, the guardians may yield, it is useful to watch what use is made of the instrument by boys—if not absolute infants—in other parts of the globe. A very good field for such observation is provided in the newly recognised Continent in the remote waters of the junction of the South Sea, the Southern Ocean and the Indian Ocean, in which a number of European communities have sprung up, all provided with representative institutions. A scene which lately took place in the New Zealand Parliament is not calculated to invite respect. From it we gather one thing. A Parliament may be an embarrassing luxury to an insufficiently advanced community, but it is apt to be a diverting institution. At a capital which cannot support a theatre, it may be a good substitute—on one side at least. But let us present a specimen of the "humours" of the New Zealand Chamber:—

"A vote of £150 having been proposed for the introduction of chamois into the island, an intelligent legislator, named Kerr, was eager for information as to what 'these shammies' were on which the Government proposed to spend so much money. Other members volunteered the intelligence that the chamois was 'a kind of goat' and 'a species of small deer,' and a Mr. Turnbull seems to have seized the opportunity to perpetrate a huge practical joke. He sent to the library for a book by 'a well-known author who gives a very interesting account of the animal and its habits,' and handed the volume to Mr. Kerr, who forthwith commenced to read aloud the passage pointed out to him. Mr. Turnbull wished to draw the line at this, and endeavoured to persuade Mr. Kerr not to take the House into his confidence, but that gentleman insisted that he would read it out: he was 'going to see what these things are.' The feelings of the House may be imagined at having gravely read out to them from 'The Tramp Abroad,' Mark Twain's description of the 'chamois' as a microscopic object which 'ran about people's clothes.'"

That not only reveals the educational status of the House but the ethnology of its composition. The English in India are well-known to be mostly Scotch. Are the Anglo-Saxons of New Zealand, too, chips of the old block of the pine of North Britain? Or, are they Khas Teutons? That story reminds us of the German scholar who, in a Latin note to a learned work of his, supports an impossible narrative in the text by a reference to a similar wonder related in the History of New York of the veracious Dutch chronicler Dredrich Knickerbocker—that being the name assumed by Washington Irving in his character of a Rebelian fabulist.

BOMBAY is mourning the death of a true and valued Parsi—Byramjee Jeejeebhoy, C.S.I. His father Jeejeebhoy Dadabhoi commenced life as a godown keeper on a salary of Rs. 20 a month, but soon left his hole to set up for a broker, and did so well as to be able to give away one lac of rupees in charity during life and at his death two lacs more. The son was worthy of the father. A shrewd man of business, he made more money and could be more charitable. He kept his head in the cotton mania during the American War, and saved not only himself but also many others by his advice. He made an endowment of Rs. 40,000 to the Poona Medical School and of Rs. 20,000 to the Ahmedabad Medical School and paid Rs. 12,000 to the Calcutta Zoroastrian Corpse-bearers' Fund. His latest and greatest charity was four lacs for a school for the poor Parsi boys. He was not unmindful of his own. In 1872 he settled in trust a large portion of his property valued at 30 lacs for the benefit of his family, not forgetting even in this connection to found a charity fund. He leaves an only son Mr. Nanabhoi who succeeds to the trust property and a grandson, who under a will, inherits the other properties and a large sum of money. He was a rare specimen of a prudent good man of whom India may well be proud. We can wish his heirs nothing better than that they may follow in his footsteps.

THE vernacular paper Sakti of Dacca assumes the resolution of the Senate on the Ripon College as final, forgetting that the matter has been referred to the Viceroy for final orders. It characterizes the justice of the Syndicate as vindictive and reminds its readers that it is to such justice that Nund Coomar was sacrificed on the gallows. Yes, but then the Bench on this occasion is not all British and the Impey is not of the unspeakable *Saheb*logues.

THE friends of our townsman Kassim Ariff Saheb will be relieved to learn that he has safely returned to Calcutta with his family. The Steamer "Deccan" was not allowed to take the passengers to Jeddah, and so she has returned to Bombay with the passengers from Kamran. There were more than 1,200 passengers on board, and out of them nearly 150 have died of cholera, and the rest have returned to India, without being able to perform the Hajj, and having suffered no end of discomforts and privations.

✓ VANITY, thy name is woman! It is the same in every land, and has been in every age. No people nor class—no stage of civilization—is free from the characteristic foible of the sex. The fair ones go to extraordinary lengths—take extreme measures—resort to unheard of devices—to outshine one another. The goddesses stoop to anything—stick at nothing—to recommend themselves to the male gods. They put on fantastic dresses and burden themselves with ornaments of infinite variety, according to taste. They use cosmetics, lubricate themselves with oils and greases, and wear charms. They do not hesitate to bore their very persons, poor delicate innocents! To bring down their shapes to the conventional standard of elegance, they even submit to Procrustean tortures which invite fatal wasting and painful diseases and hurry them on to a premature grave. Intellectual, moral and social advancement makes no substantial difference. The African beauty making herself more hideous than Nature formed her by filing off her teeth and passing a ring through her breast, is but the barbaric analogue of the daughter of civilization who dies of consumption from constant compression of her limbs in a desperate effort to pass for a figure she is not.

✓ THE ladies of Paris have now surpassed themselves. They were in good odour enough already, and now they are odour itself, thanks to their ingenuity! The fair creatures are not always scrupulously clean in their persons, while the diet of strong meat and drink must, we suppose, have a prejudicial effect on bodily fragrance—upon the attainment of that purity and freedom from odour which is the best condition of the body. At any rate, the perspiration must emit a repulsive smell which in persons of a scrofulous diathesis becomes absolutely offensive. Under the circumstances, the ladies hitherto were wont to spend an enormous quantity of perfumery in order to swamp the stinking effects of sweat and sweeten the person. But now—in their own phrase—on a change tout cela. They still use perfumes, but instead of sprinkling them on the person externally and on the clothing, they take them internally. We do not here refer to the practice of drinking spirituous scents—essences—as stimulating drink. We mean the introduction of them directly into the blood. It is said that the ladies in France have taken to inoculate themselves with scents. They take hypodermic injections of the richest perfumes. They are permanently profoundly perfumed all over. There is no risk of evaporation—no loss by drying—nay, no weakening by washing.

You may break, you may shatter the vase if you will,

But the scent of the roses will hang round it still.

In fact, the Peris are perfume itself.

There is, however, the risk of sweet scents falling into discount and desuetude. Those who are invited to the feast may come To loath the taste of sweetness, whereof little More than a little is by much too much.

Men in weariness frequently sacrifice life. What wonder the world may die of lavender and rose! This queer unnatural inoculation cannot, we are afraid, be good for the health. God forbid that the sylphs should

Die of a rose in aromatic pain!

TWO military honors are announced for the royal family. The Duke of Clarence is Gazetted Colonel of the Poona Horse. So far so good, if foolish enough. But what shall we say to the next creation?
The Duchess of Connaught has been appointed Honorary Colonel of a Prussian Infantry Regiment once commanded by her father Prince Frederick Charles. Evidently, there is no Salic law in military succession—on paper.

AT the manœuvres in Silecia, the Emperor William displayed high military genius. So did Louis Napoleon in his pamphlet on artillery, though he betrayed the white feather on the day of the Coup d'Etat, and again at the height of the Austro-Italian War.

THE Cape of Good Hope Bank has failed with liabilities amounting to three millions sterling. There is distress in the colony. Many have been ruined.

MOUSSA Bey has been exiled to Medina.

THE advance of the Mahdists on Suakim has been repulsed by the forts without any loss of life.

NINE Germans landed at Vitu. They were opposed. The natives would not have them. The Germans to prove their superiority opened fire. The natives attacked and killed eight of them.

DURING the trial of Mr. Dillon, in the Police Magistrate's Court, Tipperary, a crowd attempted a forcible entrance. The Police batoned the intruders out, who shewing resistance—many heads were broken.
Mr. John Morley who was present escaped unhurt but his Liberal soul highly agitated.

IT is said that at the request of the Czar, Sir Collin Scott Moncrieff, K.C.M.G., C.S.I., goes immediately to Merv on inspection of the irrigation works, returning to his post in Egypt in November. Russia has always shewn the Oriental readiness to seek talent wheresoever it may be found, irrespective of nationality or creed. That indeed is the secret of her rise. We only could never understand her neglect of Vambéry. Was he a hopeless case from the first?

MR. W. L. Jackson, one of the Secretaries of the Treasury, who had just returned from Ireland after traversing a thousand miles of country there, claims to be in a position to speak correctly on the potato blight.
He thinks the reports of Irish newspapers very much exaggerated.
His estimate is that the crop on the whole is satisfactory, though deficient in the home districts. But what are "home districts"? Is it a telegraphic freak for "some"?

ALL seems over with the Latter-day Saints. Their pride—the domestic institution—is gone. Their Prophet himself has eaten humble pie, with a tolerable face. The latest news from the Salt Lake City is that the Mormon President on behalf of the Church has abjured polygamy.

THE Vice-President of the Liverpool Moslem Society, in a letter to the Times, protests against the play of Mahomed on the English stage as offensive to the Mahomedan subjects of the Queen, and appeals for Government interference. We are afraid the vulgar part of the British would stick to the offence from a foolish feeling of independence. But a Conservative Government ought to be strong.

THE tension between the Turks and the Armenians is increasing. In a conflict at Van, forty persons are reported to have been killed.

NOTWITHSTANDING the declaration of Germany against immediate abolition of slavery, several Arabs have been arrested in Zanzibar for slave-trading. The Sultan means to punish them severely.

THE Australian strikes continue. Her Majesty's ships Orlando and Curaçoa have arrived at Sydney, ready to land a force of Marines if necessary to quell any disturbance.

FLOODS and fires are reported from many quarters. In Switzerland, the villages of Ruthi and Moos have been destroyed by fire. Three-fourths of the town of Colon in Panama have been burnt down. The fire was followed by looting and rioting. At last the military restored order by killing and wounding many. Father Nile, as from of old, has overflowed his banks and flooded the Damietta district. In France, the Rhone, Ardeche and Herault rose and swamped vineyards, meadows and factories. Many bridges and houses have been swept away and several persons crushed and drowned to death.

SIMLA has ceased to be the desirable residence it formerly was. Year by year, it is going down, though the pleasure-seekers and the property-owners will not see the glaring truth. There have been deaths from cholera and smallpox. It has been exceptionally unhealthy for the unacclimatised Viceroy. We are grieved to learn that Lord Lansdowne is still suffering from fever. He had had several attacks. The visit to Mashobra has been postponed, if not abandoned. By present arrangement, we regret his Lordship is pinned to the place. He must endure the horrors of the Hills till the 21st October, when he moves out on the winter tour. It is expected that the tour in Rajputana will restore his health. A very neat programme, surely, for a patient! But then he must get quit of the nasty fever, to begin with. Towards that he must quit the place, instantly. We are afraid his Lordship is depending too much on drugs. That is usually a frail reed, but most of all in malarious fever.

THE Lieutenant-Governor has for some days been keeping the community in some excitement. The telegraphic announcement of his appointment at the India Office was confounding enough, and the mysterious wording of the telegram heightened the sensation. He next followed it with a surprise in propria persona, by a bold unexpected coup on the metropolis.

Sir Stuart Bayley cut short his visit to Rungpur by one day and made a private entree into the capital on Wednesday—to the infinite disappointment of the respectable gentlemen who have consecrated themselves to the office of salaaming high officials and promising officers in and out at every turn. When these good souls after no end of enquiry satisfied themselves of the Ruler's return, they immediately ran to Alipore, but only to find the gates of Belvedere closed against them. Distracted they descended from their coaches to learn, if possible, their offence. They discovered that the great man was not there. They came away and devoted themselves to discover the patron. They found out that to avoid them he was lurking in a snug corner—between the Bengal Office and the E. I. Railway.

The Lieutenant-Governor left town for the hills yesterday. The monsoon tour has not been favorable to his health. For some days he has been suffering from low fever. He stayed with his son-in-law designate, Mr. Gladstone of Messrs. Gillanders, Arbutnot & Co.

ANOTHER notable miscarriage of justice has alarmed the whole town.
The High Court has whitewashed the depredators of the Chartered Bank, and they are now free to enjoy the fruits of their skill minus the law charges. The father and son—the cashier and his assistant—in the Bank prosecution for embezzlement and cheating and abetting have been acquitted and discharged. The jury knocked the prosecution on the head by bringing in a verdict of not guilty on the charge of embezzlement against the father. No evidence being offered on the other charges, both the accused were discharged on a formal verdict of not guilty being recorded. The jury at first disagreed and informed the Judge that they could not possibly be unanimous. Mr. Justice Prinsep knew better. They were asked to retire as they had not deliberated long. This time a spirit of harmony descended on their souls.
In little more than half an hour they came back all of one mind. The most charitable theory is that the nine gentlemen were tired of this protracted trial and returned with an unanimous verdict in favor of Shama Churn Sen. If that was the truth, it speaks little for their sense of duty. The trial will be long remembered for the varied scenes enacted in open court. The result has been a surprise, though glorious to Mr. Jackson, the defending counsel. The Judge reserved all the points raised by counsel, and yet left the case to the jury on the evidence to which exceptions had been taken. The verdict saved both prisoners and Judge—the former a long suspense followed by a lengthy getrial, and the latter from investigation by a full court of the proceedings of the session court. As the eminent stenographer Mr. Kirkpatrick was engaged throughout by the defence, we hope a full report of the proceedings will be published in a permanent form.

THE prosecution of Mr. W. G. L. Rice, late Deputy Commissioner of Magwe, Upper Burma, for criminal breach of trust as a public servant in respect of Rs. 8,000, has also fallen through. The jury would not find him guilty.

THE Maharaja of Manipur has been threatened by a show of revolution into abdication. A rising was reported to have taken place in that principality on the night of Sunday the 21st. The Maharaja's four brothers,—sons of Kirti Sing by different mothers—who hold between them all the important offices and are jealous of each other and of the Maharaja, but who seem to have combined on the present occasion to get rid of the common object of hate—seized the palace, the magazine and the four seven-pounder mountain guns—the present of the Government of India. The Maharaja, more given to religion than government, was alarmed, and saved himself by a flight to the Residency, and has since put an end to the disturbance by abdicating in favor of the Jubaraj. He immediately goes on a pilgrimage to Brindabun.

MORE stirring news comes from the State of Cambay. There was a collision between the military and the rayyets, in which the casualties were 13 killed, 20 wounded and 200 captured. The origin is traced to the new system for realization of rents in money instead of in kind and money. The rayyets suspected the Dewan Shamrao Narayan Laud to be at the bottom, and petitioned the Nawab for abolition of the tax and the dismissal of the Dewan. The Nawab appointed a Panch to enquire and report upon the grievances. The rayyets still smelt the Dewan there and again petitioned the Nawab, who accepted the responsibility of the measure and pointed out that such taxation was no new measure as it was prevalent in the Bombay Presidency. Thus disappointed in their own chief, the people applied to the British in the Political Agent, who declined to interfere. Failing of redress in all quarters, they took the law into their own hands. They issued orders for the closing of the local courts and shops and, arming themselves, paraded the streets, defying all authority, and refusing to disperse till they had their own terms as set forth in their petition to the Nawab. Their impunity emboldened them to grow furious. The patience and timidity of the Durbar being at last exhausted, the military were called out to be received with showers of stones and arrows. The military were then let loose, with the result we have stated already.

BLOODIER still have been the disturbances at Goa—over the elections. Accounts are contradictory. But all agree that at Marmagao troops fired on the mob killing and wounding many.

WE are truly pained to learn that Baboo Nagendranath Gupta, the clever young editor of the able and spirited Karachi paper Phoenix, has been sentenced to 2 months' imprisonment, in addition to a fine of Rs. 500, on a charge of defamation against Dr. Corkery, the Civil Surgeon of Shikarpur. The poor ignorant printer too is mulct in the sum of Rs. 100. The charge had once been thrown out by Mr. Steel, the District Magistrate of Shikarpur, and the accused acquitted. There was an appeal and a retrial was granted. We sincerely hope another appeal will restore Mr. Gupta to liberty and career of usefulness in Young Egypt. After a previous acquittal the sentence is cruel in its severity.

It is said that Rao Bahadar V. J. Kirtane has resigned the Dewan-ship of Indore, and that Rao Bahadar Bedarkar, of Poona, succeeds him, provided the Foreign Office accepts the arrangement.

Holloway's Pills and Ointment are particularly recommended to persons who have to pass their lives in confined and crowded places; hundreds of thousands of our fellow creatures toil from morning until evening in factories and workshops to the detriment of their health, and the deterioration of the race. They suffer in consequence from indigestion, flatulence and want of appetite, and these complaints, if neglected, bring about nervousness and failure of the vital powers. Holloway's remedies can be used by such sufferers to their very great advantage, as they are mild in action, and certain in their effects. No one need therefore lose a day's work when using them, a matter of consequence to those whose daily bread depends on daily toil.

THE juvenile patriotism of Poona has assumed the form of a pledge to wear Indian cloth only. Some of the students of the Deccan College have formed themselves—so says the Mahratta—into an Association for the purpose. This sort of folly threatens to be the ruin of our country.

WE read in the Mahratta that some two hundred cultivators met at Zambare's Chowdie and resolved upon a memorial to Government praying for relief from enhancement of the land tax and closing of waste lands hitherto allowed for cattle-grazing.

THE vacant Jute-inspectorship of the Calcutta Municipality has attracted unusual attention and, what is more, causes trouble. Before the post could properly be said to be vacant, canvassing had commenced, and immediately the vacancy was established the Chairman was besieged with applicants and applications. The post was never advertised and yet the applications numbered about eighty. The subject was discussed at several meetings, and it is not yet known what will be required of the new incumbent, for it is decided that the new man must be more than a Jute inspector. By law, the nomination must be made by the Chairman and he may be required by the Commissioners to send up three names for the selection of one. The Chairman, it appears, at first selected three, but there being no request then from the Commissioners, he sent up only one name from the office, withdrawing the other two. Of these two nominees of the Chairman, one was Baboo Dhirendranath Chatterjee, once a license Inspector of the Corporation. The Saturday Herald, the organ of the India Club, commented on this nomination, as it now appears, in the interest of a member of the Club and municipal license inspector, hinting that Baboo Dhirendranath had left the municipality under a cloud. The Chairman's next nomination excludes Baboo Dhirendranath and takes in Baboo Jogendra Chandra Bose, the license inspector who is said to have had some hand in the comments of the Herald. The appointment of a Jute Inspector comes off on Thursday next. In the meantime, Baboo Dhirendranath has obtained summonses against the editor and proprietor of the journal, Baboo Sarat Chandra Roy, and the license inspector, Baboo Jogendra Chandra Bose, for defamation. The application was moved in a pretty long speech by Baboo Amarendra Nath Chatterjee, a Pleader of the High Court, and a well-known speaker.

THE INCOME TAX.

THE Income Tax threatens to be a permanent plague. At any rate, it has got an indefinite extension of term. It is perhaps as well there should be no more any delusive, tantalising prospect of its early termination. Rather than sicken on hope continually deferred, it is better to know that we have nothing to expect, so we may adapt ourselves to the situation as best we can. For this clearing up of an ambiguous point, we are indebted to the strategy and energy of our Chamber of Commerce. In protesting against the imposition of the Income tax on foreign consignments, the Chamber, it will be remembered, tackled with the general policy of the tax itself. They justly contended that it was adopted as a temporary measure, being expressly rested upon a peculiar financial emergency for its justification and, that this being the case, it ought to be abandoned with the disappearance of the emergency which had necessitated its imposition. The Chamber did well in taking up this general position against the impost, while protesting in especial against the taxation of foreign consignments. This tax has been a source of oppression and demoralization out of all proportion to its financial advantage. The determination, therefore, now for the first time openly expressed, of continuing it has taken the public by surprise. The debate preceding the passing of the present Income Tax Act left a strong impression on the public mind that it was not to be anything more than a temporary expedient. There was indeed no formal pledge given as to the period for which it was to continue, but the whole tone and spirit of the official speaking was as good as a promise and produced all the reassurance of a pledge. A native member of the Imperial Council went the length of bringing forward a motion for fixing the term of the Act, a motion which was withdrawn as a superfluity in view of the prevailing disposition then manifest in the Council not to prolong the operation of the measure beyond the period of especial emergency. Paradoxical as it may sound, the very fact of a specific motion like this having been brought forward is proof of the then prevailing tendency of opinion in the Council in regard to the tenure of the tax. The mover of the proposition had no doubt been encouraged by this very tendency of the debate to seek to give it a definite shape and form. For the rest, there has been nothing in official or extra-official utterances on the subject since the enactment of the Act to contradict the popular belief in its temporary character. On the contrary, that belief has been more than ever confirmed by the spirit of all subsequent references made to the subject in more than one debate on the Budget Statement in the Imperial Council.

It is therefore with no small disappointment that we have read the explicit announcement of an altogether new and different policy in the Government of India's reply to the Chamber's memorial. It is now vigorously denied that the Government has ever encouraged the belief that the present income-tax would be abolished or reduced in preference to any other tax which is now levied or which was levied in 1886, while a plain warning is given that no such hopes should be indulged in for the future.

Looking to financial considerations alone, there is no prospect of the Government of India being in a position to abolish the income-tax within any measurable period.

The financial outlook, notwithstanding favorable exchange, is described as far from reassuring:—

"The Governor-General in Council would be very glad to be in a position to reduce or remit taxation, and no pressure of public opinion will be required to induce him to relieve the tax-payer when it is seen that revenue can safely be surrendered. * * * At the present moment the ordinary revenue and expenditure of the year promise to turn out considerably worse than the estimate of March last; and though the rise in exchange will no doubt do much more than counterbalance the deterioration in other respects, it must be recollected that doubts have been expressed by some authorities whether the purchase by the American Government of a limited (though considerable) quantity of silver will have a permanent effect upon exchange, and the future is still quite uncertain in respect to this important drain on the public treasury."

The payers of income-tax have by no means the first claim on a permanent surplus. The Chamber have got a sharp rejoinder to their plea for relief from the tax. The Government has given them a smart rebuff. It is distinctly stated that "There is no class of the Indian community which receives greater benefits from British rule than do the commercial, banking, manufacturing, official, and professional classes, and it would in the opinion of the Government of India amount to a serious political scandal if these classes, by the abolition of the present tax, were absolved from contributing to the wants of the State in a degree bearing some proportion to their wealth."

Nor is the decision of the Government on the especial prayer of the Chamber more favorable in the long run. The assessment of consignor's profits will indeed for the present be in abeyance, but it does not seem likely that it is abandoned finally. Enquiries will be made into the system by which the practical difficulties of the assessment of such profits are overcome in England, and should such enquiries show that the English system may be followed here, the present orders will be withdrawn. The Government conveys its views on this point as follows:—

"I am to remind the Chamber that, by a recent ruling, the taxation of the profits made by consignors resident in foreign countries has been declared to be legal in England, and that the Revenue Commissioners have taken steps to enforce the decision. The Governor-General in Council is not aware whether the objections to which the Chamber draws attention have been found to exist in practice in England, or, if they exist, how they have been overcome. Steps will be taken to obtain information on these points, but meanwhile, as the Government of India is not aware at present of any means by which the difficulty referred to in paragraph 16 can be met, it has decided, in accordance with the wishes of the Chamber, to keep the orders for the assessment of the profits of consignments in abeyance."

The whole is a message of despair. Coming after the Under-Secretary of State's Budget statement, it will cause little surprise. With such an overflowing surplus as the turn in the exchange has unexpectedly produced, the Government could, if so minded, have given relief at any rate to the lower classes of income tax assesses. But it is not to be. And arguments can never be wanting to justify a policy of caution.

THE RAJPUTANA STATES.

THE last year's Rajputana report is, as reports usually are, generally satisfactory. British methods of administration are being followed, civilization advanced, and the states brought up to a level with the surrounding British territory. Crime is no longer as rife as before. No cases of witch-swinging, of kidnapping or of Sati are reported, while only one case of infanticide occurred during the year. Cattle-lifting and other forms of dacoity are indeed still prevalent, but they show a marked diminution. The management of criminal tribes receives great attention. The Bhils are evidently much looked after and are not a little improved, for, in spite of indifferent harvests, their conduct has been generally quiet. A school has been for some years at work for the education of Bhil children. The interests of these tribes are anxiously watched by the Agent to the Governor-General, and it is not possible for the Durbars to neglect them. The settlement of Moghies, another criminal tribe, appears also to have been successful.

The British officers appear to have attained a fair measure of success in the settlement of boundary disputes. These disputes are often of an inveterate kind, and afford unusual difficulty to the British Agent. A great improvement has, of late, resulted in this respect from the establishment of Border Courts, and many disputes of long standing are reported to have been adjusted by their intervention.

The Public Works Department in Rajputana has been steadily developing. The total expenditure, excluding the outlay on Imperial Irrigation works, amounted to a little less than 34 lakhs of rupees. In the chief states, the works are under the supervision of officers lent by the British Government. The Postal Department also shows steady increase of work. There are in all about 224 Post-offices in the different states, of which no less than 25 were opened during the last year. These offices are divided into three classes, Head-offices, Sub-offices, and branch-offices—the last being worked by extra-departmental agents, such as Station-masters, School-masters, hospital assistants and even shop keepers. The plan is economical, but not always satisfactory, particularly in the case of School-masters who are generally reported to be above their work. Much trouble accompanied with no little loss is caused to this department by a curious practice among Marwari traders in the Bombay Presidency. They are accustomed to send heavy anonymous letters containing pieces of iron, bricks, and waste paper to their partners absent on leave. The intention of the senders is thus indirectly to fine their partners for their absence by making them pay the postage, and so to remind them of the necessity of returning to duty. But the heavy (in more senses than one) practical joke does not take. The addressees invariably are wide awake enough to refuse the missives, leaving the Department the unpleasant task of carrying them backwards and forwards, without being able to recover the postage from the senders, whose names are never given.

The general condition of Rajputana during the year was about normal. The rainfall, if not quite seasonable, was sufficient, but the absence of rain in the cold weather with frosts and locusts affected the crops in most districts. The ravages of the locusts were particularly severe in Marwar, Jeysulmir, and Bikanir. As usual, this led to the migration of people, although those who remained were assisted by the Durbar by the remission of rents and the provision of labor.

In Jodhpur, the Railway has proved remunerative. Further extensions are either under contemplation or already fairly advanced. A Survey Party was at work in Bikanir and Jeysulmir during the winter of last year on the proposed railways from Sind. Work has been commenced on two lines of railways, one from Jodhpur to Bikanir via Nagore, and the other a loop line connecting Jodhpur and Nawa. The record of irrigation works is also creditable. Altogether, the Durbars show appreciation—sometimes, too much it is to be feared—of the example of the great British Government. Education is eagerly sought after, and the majority of the States are represented in the Mayo College. The college scored signal success last year. Two Rajput youths for the first time matriculated in the Allahabad University. The importance of the event was marked by the successful competitors being loaded with medals.

SALT v. SALTPETRE.

THE Salt Department has once more turned its fostering attentions to the Saltpetre Refineries of Calcutta. Its last raid had ended in a compromise that left the Refiners free to dispose off their Refuse by either exporting it to foreign countries under official surveillance or transforming it into saltpetre of high refraction by admixture anew with a quantity of the pure material. The intention, however, from the beginning, notwithstanding repeated protestations, was to convert the Refiners into manufacturers of dutiable salt. In no other way could pressure be put upon them than by obstructing the disposal of the Refuse. So that when it would accumulate the Refiners might be compelled to either excise it at Rs. 2-8 per maund or destroy it at their own cost. Finding that the compromise enabled the Refiners to easily get rid of their Refuse, the settlement was "reconsidered." The effect of this "reconsideration" was to withdraw the orders that had been issued about admixture. Formerly, the Refiners could, by admixture, convert the Refuse into a commodity whose refraction was represented by sixty to seventy per cent. Under the orders issued after "reconsideration," no saltpetre could be manufactured by admixture whose refraction would exceed forty per cent. The revised orders, again, as worded, are exceedingly vague. No limit of refraction has been laid down, with reference to the article manufactured by admixture, within which the Refiners may dispose of the article without official interference.

We understand, again, that the Salt Establishment in Calcutta, with the exception of a European Superintendent, having a very large jurisdiction to supervise and whose stay in the metropolis can by no means be permanent, is innocent of English and corresponds with the Refiners in the Persian language! The latter have to pay for translates of these communications before they can understand them. The officer must be a very old fossil, requiring a thorough shake, who could, in these days, deliberately send a Mogul Fiscal Establishment to the metropolis of British India, for communicating in Persian with the traders and merchants here. How long, we ask, has English education fallen into such disuse in India that the State in one of its important departments of Revenue should be under the necessity of employing men ignorant of English and that in the metropolis of all places?

A case has already occurred of individual hardship, that will best illustrate the spirit of the Department in its dealings with the Refiners. It shows how circumlocution can, when it chooses, be expeditious when the object is to vindicate its own might. We will advert to it in a future issue.

INCOME TAX.

No. 4339.

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

FINANCE AND COMMERCE DEPARTMENT.

SEPARATE REVENUE.

Assessed Taxes.

To—The Secretary to the Bengal Chamber of Commerce, Calcutta.

Simla, the 8th September 1890.

SIR,—The Governor-General in Council has had under consideration the memorial of the Chamber received with your letter No. 444, dated the 20th May last, in which the Chamber protests against the assessment to Income-tax of the profits on goods consigned to agents for sale in India. The Chamber has also taken the opportunity to embody in the memorial a statement of objections to the policy of an Income-tax and to the manner in which the administration of the tax is conducted, and observing that no financial necessity for the revenue obtained from the tax now exists, asks that the question of the continuance of the tax may be taken into consideration.

2. The Chamber's request for the discontinuance of the tax is supported by the arguments stated below:

(1) The tax was imposed in 1886 as a special call upon the country, and, the need for the call having disappeared with a surplus of two and three-quarter crores of rupees and the restoration of the finances to a sound condition, the tax should now be repealed.

(2) The tax is not in any way suited to such a country as India, and in support of this proposition it is stated that, after thirty years of official effort under many and various disguises, the Government has failed to make such a tax acceptable to the people, fair in its incidence, or reasonably remunerative.

(3) Complaints are becoming rife all over the country in regard to the working of the Act; and quoting certain statements made by the Honourable J. D. Inglis in 1871, the Chamber asserts that a large percentage of the population escapes the tax altogether by bribery or false returns, and that it is as true to-day as it was nineteen years ago that "for every man who pays Income-tax twenty 'pay to get off, and that for every rupee that is paid into the 'treasury another is paid to the subordinate native officials.....; 'everywhere throughout the country the people are being demoralised by the tax; everywhere false returns are sent in; everywhere the trading classes are beginning to keep two sets of books '—one set showing accurately the real transactions, the other containing a carefully prepared garbled account to be shown to the 'Income-tax assessors."

3. With reference to the first of the arguments advanced in the preceding paragraph, the Governor-General in Council is unable to admit either that the tax was imposed in 1886 as a special and temporary call upon the country, or that the time has now arrived for its abolition.

There is no class of the Indian community which derives greater benefits from British rule than do the commercial, banking, manufacturing, official, and professional classes, and it would, in the opinion of the Government of India, amount to a serious political scandal if these classes, by the abolition of the present tax, were absolved from contributing to the wants of the State in a degree bearing some proportion to their wealth.

The remarks made by Sir Auckland Colvin, in proposing the legislation under which the present tax is levied, show clearly that the main object of Government at that time was the more equitable distribution of the burden of taxation over the Indian community; this is an object the attainment of which is quite incompatible with the introduction of a measure intended to be temporary in its operation, and framed merely to meet the financial difficulties of the day. He said:

"There can, after all is said and done, be no manner of doubt but that one great fact remains established; one great blot on our administration not only still unremoved, but aggravated by the course of events in recent years. It is this; that putting aside those who derive their income from land in the temporarily-settled districts, the classes in this country who derive the greatest security and benefit from the British Government are those who contribute the least towards it. Many opinions of many kinds have from time to time been expressed as to the nature of the advantages and disadvantages introduced into the country by British rule, but on one point all (even the most venomous and hostile of our critics) are agreed, and that is that it has given greater security to life, property, and trade, and to the amassing thereof of wealth, than any Government that ever preceded it. Yet not only the mercantile and professional classes, to whom this time of sunshine has brought such an abundant harvest, are precisely those who contribute least towards the support of the Government in the light of whose power they bask . . . I know that what I have said as to the immunity of the middle and upper classes from their due share of the public burdens is as a twice-told tale vexing the dull ears of a drowsy man; but it is nevertheless a grievous blot on our Indian administration, which urgently calls for removal, and which, I believe, with patience, prudence, and the exercise of a little fortitude must, and will, be removed. Efforts have, indeed, at various times been made to remedy this scandal, for scandal it is of the greatest magnitude when the poorest are called upon to pay heavily for the support of the Government, and the wealthier classes are exempted; but from one cause or another the measure has never been carried out except for short and broken periods of time."

4. The present tax is a development and extension of the license taxes of 1878, and the history of its origin shows that it did not assume its present form solely in view of pressing financial needs.

The license tax, from which the present tax has sprung, was one of the taxes imposed for the purpose of securing in ordinary years a surplus of revenue over expenditure which would balance the occasional and exceptional expenditure on famine which might from time to time be expected. The taxation imposed took the form of cesses on the land which fell on the agricultural classes, and of a license tax which was paid by the trading classes. The exemption of the official and professional classes from the operation of the license tax caused the Chamber and other public bodies to protest against the continuance of the tax in the form in which it was sanctioned by the Legislature, and these representations had great weight in finally determining the Government of India to extend the operation and enlarge the scope of the tax. This determination was carried into effect in 1886, and the circumstances were thus explained by Sir Auckland Colvin in the Legislative Council on the 4th July of that year:

"The financial policy of the Indian Government since 1878 has pointed steadily at direct taxation. From that year onward, he that ran could read the indications of the time. In point of fact, for the last eight years we have had direct taxation, but in a form so incomplete and so open to criticism that it was impossible not to foresee that it must be, on the first convenient opportunity, replaced by some measure more equitable in itself, and more suited to the circumstances of the country. An attempt has been made, and is still in operation under the form of a license tax, to carry out direct taxation in part, but it is open to the vital objection that it presses most heavily on the poorer among the trading, mercantile, and commercial classes, and leaves the wealthier, besides other whole classes of the upper part of the population, comparatively or absolutely unassessed. Almost from the day of its introduction efforts have been made by public bodies in this country, both English and Native, to obtain, instead of the existing license tax, a more equal distribution of direct taxation, and acknowledgments have been tendered by the Government of the evils inseparable from that tax as at present enforced, and of its determination when a fitting opportunity arose of putting it on a more equitable footing. In point of fact, so far had the matter gone, and so ripe was it for settlement, that if no financial necessities had now overtaken us, we should have been imperatively called upon in any case very shortly either to abandon direct taxation altogether, or to take some measure of the nature which we now propose to introduce. It was impossible to go on from year to year admitting and deploring the evils of the existing tax, and doing nothing whatever to remedy them. That was how the matter stood till the commencement of this year. We had the choice of abandoning direct taxation or of extending it; and we were in such a position that we could no longer decently delay making up our mind to adopt one or the other."

It will, therefore, be seen that the license taxes of 1878 were an attempt to make a certain section of the community contribute to the cost of government. Their extension and consolidation under the form of the Income-tax of 1886 were undertaken with the object of effecting a more equitable adjustment of that tax, and the financial difficulties of 1886 were the occasion, rather than the cause, of the extension.

5. It is unnecessary to remind the Chamber that no tax can be considered to be final either as regards form or rate, but I am to say that the Government of India has never given any sanction to the belief that the present Income-tax would be abolished or reduced in preference to any other tax which is now levied, or which was levied in 1886.

The understanding on this point is clearly shown by the remarks of the Honourable Robert Steel in the Legislative Council on 29th January 1886, and the reply made by Sir Auckland Colvin on the same date:

The Honourable Robert Steel: "The Honourable Mr. Mukerji has given notice of his intention to propose that the duration of the Bill shall be limited to one year. I will not anticipate his remarks, but I will take this opportunity to say that, whatever be the result of his amendment, the payers of Income-tax will now fairly claim that under the present Bill they will contribute at least their full share; and, when any remission of taxation is possible, they will expect that their case shall be considered on its merits along with all other claims for relief which may be put forward."

The Honourable Sir Auckland Colvin: "With regard to the duration of the tax, the Honourable Mr. Steel has put the case in an extremely fair way, namely, that if the Government finds itself in a position to make remissions of revenue hereafter, the question of the Income-tax should be put on the same footing and receive the same consideration as any other question of remission of revenue."

6. The Governor-General in Council would be very glad to be in a position to reduce or remit taxation, and no pressure from public opinion will be required to induce him to relieve the taxpayer when it is seen that revenue can safely be surrendered. The surplus of 2½ crores to which the Chamber points was, however, largely accidental and temporary, and cannot be taken into account as a factor in determining whether any permanent remission of taxation is possible. The surplus in the estimates of the current year is only 27 lakhs, and that surplus was secured after allotting only 60 lakhs as the provision for insurance against famine, and of that sum 49 lakhs are a special receipt from Local Governments. At the present moment the ordinary revenue and expenditure of the year promise to turn out considerably worse than the estimate of March last; and though the rise in exchange will no doubt do much more than counterbalance the deterioration in other respects, it must be recollected that doubts have been expressed by some authorities whether the purchase by the American Government of a limited (though considerable) quantity of silver will have a permanent effect upon exchange, and the future is still quite uncertain in respect to this important drain on the public treasury.

7. I am further to remind the Chamber that there are other taxes which have been incorporated into the fiscal system since the Income-tax Act was passed, and that the payers of Income-tax have, by no means, the first claim on a permanent surplus. Since January 1886 the principal measures adopted for increasing the public revenues have been--

- (1) the absorption of the surplus designed as an insurance against famine, which surplus has recently been only partially restored;
- (2) the increase of the duty on salt in India from Rs. 2 to Rs. 2½ a maund, and in Burma from 3 annas to one rupee;
- (3) the imposition of an import duty on petroleum;
- (4) the imposition of a patwari cess in the North-Western Provinces and Oudh.

In the opinion of the Government of India, there are several fiscal reforms which should take precedence of the claims of the payers of Income-tax, or should at least receive equal consideration whenever the Government finds that it has a permanent surplus at its disposal.

Having regard also to the origin of the tax, it would be necessary to deal with the claims of the payers of Income-tax and of the cesses on land imposed in 1878 concurrently. Sir John Strachey's remarks on this point in 1880 were:

"It would be hardly possible to maintain the cesses on the land if the tax on trades were abolished. It might be more possible to defend the abolition of the cesses on the land and the maintenance of the tax on trades."

These remarks have lost none of their force, and it will be apparent that, looking to financial considerations alone, there is no prospect of the Government being in a position to abolish the Income-tax within any measurable period.

8. The statement that the tax is unsuitable because the Government has not succeeded in making it acceptable to the people appears to the Government of India to require qualification. No taxation of which the burden comes home directly to those who pay it can be said to be acceptable to such persons. The question is not whether the tax is popular with those who pay it, but whether it is just in principle and fair in application. As to the justice of the principle, there is no room for difference of opinion. As to the fairness of the assessment, the chief shortcomings were due originally to the novelty of the tax, to the difficulty of obtaining information regarding the incomes of the persons assessed, and to the changes from income to license tax, from license to certificate tax, and from certificate to Income-tax again, which were made in the period ending in 1871. These changes were a source of perplexity to the more illiterate classes who were also harassed by the want of fixity in the rate, by the low limits of taxable income, and by the inefficiency, and in some cases the misconduct, of the assessing agency. These features of the tax as it existed in former years have for the most part disappeared. The form of taxation has lost its novelty; a considerable amount of information regarding the incomes of the trading classes has been accumulated; changes in the character of the tax are no longer made; the rate of assessment which was fixed in 1886, and the minimum of taxable income, have remained unaltered; and the assessing agency has been greatly improved. The specially objectionable features to which discontent and hostility to the tax are in great part due have therefore ceased to exist.

9. The Chamber's argument that the tax is not fair in its incidence because a large portion of the revenue derived from it is collected in the Presidency towns is answered in a letter recently received from the Upper India Chamber of Commerce supporting the memorial of the Bengal Chamber. The Chamber writes:

"While accepting the fact, as pointed out in the memorial under reference, that the incidence of the tax is higher in the Presidency towns than elsewhere, they consider that inasmuch as the ports are, practically speaking, the entrepôts for the whole seaborne trade of the country, this is a natural concomitant, and does not mean that the impost is individually less oppressive in the Provinces."

To the Government of India it appears that the collection of a large proportion of the Income-tax in the Presidency towns is not a stronger argument for the abolition of the tax than the fact that the salt revenue is chiefly paid by the population outside these towns is an argument for the abolition of the duty on salt. The increase in the collections in Calcutta in 1888-89, to which the Chamber draws attention as illustrating the rigour with which the tax is administered in that city, was largely due to the discovery that certain traders had for some time been under-assessed, and was not merely the result of an unduly rigorous administration, as is evident from the fact that the number of processes issued fell from 2,283 in 1887-88 to 1,243 in 1888-89. The collections of 1889-90 have exceeded those of the previous year by about a lakh of rupees, while the number of processes issued was no more than 112. These facts appear to testify to the increased efficiency of the assessing and collecting agency.

10. The statement that the tax is not "reasonably remunerative" is of doubtful accuracy. The net revenue, deducting cost of collection, amounted last year to about Rs. 1,500,000 (one hundred and fifty lakhs)—a sum which represents the amount of the provision for insurance against famine, as originally contemplated.

11. As regards the third argument of the Chamber, I am to say that the information before the Government does not support the assertion that complaints are rife all over the country in regard to the working of the tax. The reports on the administration of the Act since 1886 contain but rare instances of misconduct or fraud on the part of the assessing and collecting agency. Even in remote districts the people are becoming less and less inclined every year to submit silently to extortion or oppression, and the assesses in the Presidency towns would certainly not do so.

12. With reference to the Chamber's assertion that the statements made by Mr. Inglis in 1871, and quoted in paragraph 2 (3) of this letter, are as true to-day as they were then, the Governor-General in Council desires me to remind the Chamber that those statements were shewn on investigation to be couched in exaggerated language, and that whatever truth was contained in them was found to have been largely due to the assessments having been made by officials of an inferior class. The results of the investigation were made public at the time. No such reason for failure in administration can be alleged at the present day; for in Bengal the assessments are made by a special agency, and elsewhere the orders provide that the assessing officers shall not be of a lower grade than tahsildars and mamlatdars. There can be no doubt that cases of evasion of the law occur in India as they do in other countries, and in connection with the Income-tax as with every other tax, direct or indirect; but, however great the financial necessities of 1886 may have been, the Government of India does not believe that the Chamber of Commerce would have given its adhesion to the imposition of an Income-tax, even as a temporary measure, if it had really apprehended that such widespread corruption was inseparable from its levy as was stated by Mr. Inglis.

13. The Members of the Calcutta Chamber of Commerce represent a community which contributes materially to the Income-tax revenue, and the Government of India will always be glad to receive from the Chamber any suggestions for the improvement of the assessing and collecting agency, or to cause enquiry to be made into cases of alleged malpractices; but it seems to the Governor-General in Council that when allegations of general and widespread corruption are made, having for their object the abolition of the tax and the exemption of a large class from what is only a reasonable contribution to the wants of the State, such allegations would carry more weight if they were supported by specific facts of the present time, falling within the knowledge of the Members of the Chamber or their constituents, rather than by the revival of an exaggerated statement of 1871 regarding a state of things which no longer exists.

14. Turning to the question which has given rise to the present correspondence, I am directed to say that the Government of India as at present advised, entertains no doubt that the tax may legally be levied on the profits of goods which are consigned to this country for sale. Nor does it appear to the Government of India that the levy of the tax on such profits would be inequitable. The Indian trader who purchases articles made in India for resale to the public, as well as the Indian trader who purchases articles abroad for sale in India, alike, pay tax on the profits of their transactions, and there is no good reason why the foreign trader who consigns goods to India for sale should not in his turn contribute to the revenues of the State which offers him a market for his goods, and provides for their safety.

15. All taxes have certain features in common, but the Government of India is unable to discover any ground for the statement that a tax on the profits made by consigning goods for sale to India is practically a duty on imports. An import duty is levied on the quantity or value of all goods imported, and places such goods at a disadvantage as compared with similar goods produced in the country. The proposed tax (which) would not be levied on imported goods, but on the profits of certain transactions, would not place the goods which were the subject of those transactions at any disadvantage, but would merely deprive them of an unfair advantage which they now possess as compared with similar goods produced in India or imported by Indian traders.

16. But while the Government of India considers it necessary to explain the principles which influenced it in contemplating the taxation of such consignments, and to defend the soundness of the course which it proposed to adopt, it recognises the difficulties which necessarily attend any attempt to estimate the profits of such transactions. The assessor has not the means of doing so, and the assumption of a percentage of the value as a preliminary assessment would evidently give rise to error in particular cases, though it might be fair on the average.

The agent in this country could not of his own knowledge state with accuracy the amount of profit, and his action in attempting to estimate the profit would doubtless be resented by the consignor, and would impose an unfair responsibility on the consignee.

The Government of India believes that the consignor could state with reasonable accuracy the amount of profit on each transaction, but the Chamber of Commerce is of opinion that he could not be depended upon to do so in all cases.

Such cases of misstatement of profits on the part of consignors, even if not very numerous, would be sufficient to create doubt as to all returns, and such doubts could only be removed by an examination of the books of the consignor. These books being in foreign countries and at a distance from India, it is obvious that there would be no criterion which could be applied to test the returns of profit, unless at the risk of causing an amount of trouble and inconvenience which would be out of proportion to the revenue to be collected.

17. At the same time I am to remind the Chamber that, by a recent ruling, the taxation of the profits made by consignors resident in foreign countries has been declared to be legal in England, and that the Revenue Commissioners have taken steps to enforce the decision. The Governor-General in Council is not aware whether the objections to which the Chamber draws attention have been found to exist in practice in England, or, if they exist, how they have been overcome. Steps will be taken to obtain information on these points, but meanwhile, as the Government of India is not aware at present of any means by which the difficulty referred to in paragraph 16 can be met, it has decided, in accordance with the wishes of the Chamber, to hold the orders for the assessment of the profits of consignments in abeyance.

If a satisfactory method of solving the question should hereafter be proposed, and the Government of India should decide to renew the attempt to tax the profits of consignments, the intention of Government, and the means which it proposes to adopt, will be made public before orders for assessment are issued.

OUR LADY'S SHRINE.

I.

Mother of purity, and peace, and grace,
Who offerest from this flower-encircled shrine
To all who grovel, and to all who pine,
The comfort of thy heav'n-directed face,

How often have I lingered here a space
To lay before thy feet some thoughts of mine,
And muse on all the hands and eyes divine
Which turned with pity to man's pleading race!

Stands one of these more near to us than thou,
In this abyss of suffering darkly whirl'd,
Since he who shared with thee thy Syrian home

Has passed beyond the stars, and wielding now
The awful pomps of godhead and of doom
Sits throned as Judge and Maker of the World?

II.

One will so wholly binds and governs me,
That other wills, and mine the first of all,
Appear too vagrant, weak, and casual,
To fix the limits of my liberty,

Or move this way and that my potency,
As this one does, like signs celestial,
Which, as some judge, the souls of men enthrall,
And make them all they have been or shall be.

So knowing this, I need not inly fret,
If often I behold a clouded face,
And eyes which seem less gracious than they were;

Since Fate, which knows no lenience or regret,
Has fixed the path that henceforth I must trace,
And slays each thought or dream which looks elsewhere.

HORÆ NEAPOLITANÆ.

I.

AT LEOPARDI'S GRAVE.

Say, has Death stanch'd at last the bitter ruth,
Which preyed upon thy heart continually,
And coloured all thy thought and fantas,
With pictures of a world perverse, uncouth?

For not Philosophy, not Art, not Faith,
Which change for us the mode of things we see,
Might shake thy sadness, or divert from thee
The Gorgon forehead of remorseless truth.

Yea even Love, which for a little space,
So much you granted, cheats our human pain
With fond illusion, quailed before thine eyes:

No daughter of our race relaxed thy chain,
Pity or Passion kindling in her face,
Or shared the burden of those weary sighs.

THE MUSEUM.

Not always will light Fancy be controlled,
So much I learned when first my feet explored
These spacious halls and stately galleries stored
With marvels spared us from an age of gold,

And lingered long where eyes might best behold
The goddess, with reverted head, who stands,
Her drapery slipping from relaxing hands,
And loves the tender curves behind unrolled.

Ah, you have lived too long (I heard her say)
In that grey world which feeds on bitter bread,
Self-questionings which all your powers employ;

How should you catch the spirit of our day,
Which boldly followed wheresoever led
The fearless feet of Beauty and of Joy?"

NEWS AND OUR COMMENTS.

THE unprecedented persistency and violence of the rains for several days ending in Sunday last, as they interfered with trade and business in general, were not without their effect on the Press. In fact, they caused something like a "silly season." Our leader of Hare Street's house was so battered and his staff and establishment were so damped by the dreadful downpour, that on Monday morning the Englishman appeared with this opening editorial paragraph, to wit:—

"Mr. Mackenzie's chances of the Lieutenant-Governorship is (sic.) said to be in the ascendant."

Leaving such trifles as "L. L. D." for "LL. D." in para. 6, we come to the leader "Curiosities of Cross-examination" on the Jain Case in the Police Court, and therein we stumble upon such—we do not say grammar but printing as—

"The proceedings were commenced in July, and the case for the prosecution has not it (sic.) yet closed."

THE Gold Fever continues, with some abatement. Most of the companies are still at premium.

Subscribers in the country are requested to remit by postal money orders, if possible, as the safest and most convenient medium, particularly as it ensures acknowledgment through the Department. No other receipt will be given any other being unnecessary, and likely to cause confusion.

MEANWHILE, they have struck oil at Deghbri, Upper Assam. The whole system of hills from the Eastern end of the Himalaya down to the sea is rich in minerals.

DURING the last fourteen years in India, the cotton-spinning and weaving mills have increased from 14 to 137. The number of spindles is given at 3,274,196, the daily average hands employed being 12,721. Bombay contributes just over-half of the total number.

The Nilgiri Railway Company have begun operations. The line is expected to be completed by December 1892. And the Governor of Madras on the 1st of this month cut the first sod of the East Coast Railway and allowed us to expect in no long time through railway communication between Calcutta and Madras.

THE Cashmere Durbar is going in for leprosy. A hospital will be opened at Srinagar at a cost of Rs. 50,000, to accommodate 50 lepers. The cost of maintenance is not stated. This seems to be the recognized mode of currying Imperial favor.

MR. Nolan has been commissioned to report on the crops in the flooded parts of this Province. During his absence on special duty, Mr. Buckland acts the Revenue Secretary to the Bengal Government. This gives an opportunity to Mr. K. G. Gupta to be the Secretary to the Board of Revenue, in addition to his own duties as Junior Secretary.

UNDER the head of sanitation, the Calcutta Gazette notifies the appointment of Assistant Apothecary F. W. A. L'Estrange to have medical charge of the Voluntary Venereal Hospital at Jellapahar. This is a significant commentary on the repeal of the Contagious Diseases Act.

THE visitors to the Indian Museum, last month, were Europeans 529 male and 120 female and Natives 29,045 male and 8,330 female, giving a daily average of 1,728 during the 22 days it was open.

THE Ramnad partition suit has closed in the first court—the Subordinate Court, Madura East. The Subordinate Judge Mr. S. Gopalachariar has taken time to consider his judgment, as was to be expected on account of the importance of the suit and the learned and historical arguments advanced on both sides and the mass of evidence—oral and documentary—recorded. The main point is whether the zemindari is partible property or being of the nature of a Raj descendible to a single heir. There is also a will by the late zemindar which complicates the matter. Messrs. Norton, Barrister-at-Law, Sadagopachariar, Desikachariar and V. Bhashyachariar, High Court Vakils, appeared for plaintiff, Dinakarasami Setupati, and Rai Bahadur S. Subramoneya Iyer, C.I.E., the Honourable V. Bhashyam Iyengar, Row Bahadur R. Ramasubbier, Messrs. M. S. Narayanaswami Aiyer and Desikachari, High Court Vakils, and Mr. R. Strinivasa Aiyengar, 1st Grade Pleader, represented defendant, Baskarasami Setupati.

Rai Bahadur S. Subramoneya Iyer, opened the defence to this effect :—

"Plaintiff's case was that the Zemindari in dispute was a partible property as that of an ordinary Hindu family governed by the Mitakshara law, and that he was entitled to a share therein. Defendant's case was that the Zemindari was an impartible Raj descendible to a single heir according to the law of Primogeniture and that Plaintiff was not entitled to any share. Pannai, Siritettu and other lands, also the management of the Devasthanam went with the enjoyment of the Zemindari and rested solely with Defendant. Defendant also alleged that a Will was left by the late Zemindar under which also he was entitled to the Zemindari. If the Court held that the estate was partible, the Will was of no use as Plaintiff's share could not be affected by it. If the Court held that the estate was impartible, the Will would have a most important bearing on the case as evidentiary matter with reference to the partibility or the impartibility of the Zemindari. The principal question was as to the nature of the Zemindari and other properties. With reference to the question of impartibility, he would make the following general observation. No doubt all ordinary Hindu property was partible and as regards impartible properties, a distinction should be borne in mind between properties which are impartible by virtue of the political condition of the family and properties which are impartible by virtue of the custom or Kulachar of the family. In the present case both these conditions were relied on. Defendant contended that the Zemindari in dispute was in the first place a Raj and therefore impartible and in the second place that the custom of the family was to hold it as impartible. The evidence which related to the latter question would also apply to the former. If it was shown that the estate was descendible to a single heir, it would also go to show that it was a Raj at one time. If it was shown to be a Raj, it was not necessary that its holder should be an absolute sovereign subject to no power. It was only necessary to show that it was a Raj though the holder might be a subject power or feudal chief. The incident of impartibility attached to properties other than Raj, such as a property held under military tenure. When it was said that the property was impartible, it was not meant that it could not be separated under any circumstances, but that the Municipal law did not entitle any one to claim partition. Nobody could possibly question the right of the holder of a Raj to divide it among his sons, as it would be only an exercise of his right of alienation. The Zemindari of Sivagunga was carved out of the Ramnad Zemindari which showed that there might be division, not by the operation of the law of inheritance but by the voluntary act of the holder. Some of Tippoo's territories were divided between various powers, but that did not show that the State of Mysore was divisible. West and Buhler's Hindu Law, 3rd Edition, pp. 735-44 dealt with impartible property (Portion of p. 736 was read out). That showed that the question of partibility or impartibility was to be judged by rules which were beyond the pale of Municipal law. Under political condition came the following properties. 1. Raj. 2. Properties in the nature of a Raj such as property held under Military Tenure or attached to particular offices or for the maintenance of any one."

THE British Indian Association held its half-yearly meeting on Tuesday in its rooms. It was a tame affair and a hole and corner business. There were present two dozen members including the President. The Secretary was supposed to read the report of the period by only enumerating the subjects taken up and informing the meeting that four members have been added to the list. The President very briefly referred to the Bill introduced by Government for the recovery of the land revenue and other public demands, and concluded his address by lamenting "the death of two of its (Association's) oldest and most respected members." The auditory were greatly moved and burst into applause, as reported in the Statesman. Not to be misunderstood, we quote from our contemporary :—

"I cannot conclude without referring to the death of two of its oldest and most respected members. I refer to Baboos Denonath Mullick and Mohesh Chunder Chowdhury. I am sure I express the sense of every member of the Association when I say that their loss is deeply regretted (applause)."

The final equality of the two British Indians reminds one of Addison's reflections in Westminster Abbey. In respect of one of the two, the President exhibited a rare example of Christian virtue.

The necrology, however, was only preliminary to the business of the evening. It appears that the rooms of the Association were purchased in 1868 with its own funds and contributions from members and from the Hurish Chunder Memorial and the Grant Memorial funds. The property stands in the name of the then Secretary. Permission was taken at this meeting to transfer it from Bahoo Jotindro Mohun Tagore the Secretary to Maharajah Sir Jotindra Mohun Tagore, Maharaja Sir Norendra Krishna, Raja Rajendralal Mitra, Raja Doorga Churn Law and Raja Peary Mohun Mookerjee so that they may hold the same in trust for the Association. Raja Doorga Churn doubted whether the Association could appoint trustees for a property acquired with moneys not all its own, but Baboo Gonesh Chunder who moved the resolution assured the meeting that it could. "Those funds," he said, "were and are entirely under the management of this Association, and it is quite within our province to appoint the trustees for the property, no matter if it was acquired partly by money from 'those funds.' That explanation dispelled doubts and disarmed opposition. Relying on the attorney-at-law, the meeting voted unanimously for the proposition, involving the complete appropriation of the two Funds.

Holloway's Ointment and Pills.—Self Help.—Prior to the discovery of these remedies an easy, ready and reliable remedy for outward disfigurements and inward complications was, practically speaking, unknown. No one need now be at a loss if they should unfortunately suffer from piles, ulcers, sores, tumours, boils, bruises, sprains, &c. Enveloping Holloway's medicines are very intelligible printed directions for using them, which should be attentively studied and immediately followed by all who resort to his treatment. Sooner or later the sufferer will assuredly triumph over the worst diseases. This searching Ointment disperses all those malignant humours which aggravate diseases of the skin, prevent the cicatrization of ulcers, and excite inflammatory tendencies in the system.

THE young Maharaja Jagat Jit Singh of Kapurthala completes his eighteenth year on the 24th November. Sir James Lyall will shortly invest him with full powers as ruler. The Maharaja has already complete charge of the household and military offices, which he is said to control with marked energy and ability.

THE latest American scheme of American proportions is a canal for the drainage of Chicago by carrying the filth in solution to the Mississippi. It is planned to have a fall of a few feet, so that at the Chicago end, the highest point, 300,000 gallons per minute of fresh water from Lake Michigan may flow into it. This enormous inflow of pure water is calculated to carry off the sewage southward, purifying the while the inflow of sewage. The cost is estimated at thirty million dollars to be raised by taxation.

THERE was another interruption to through traffic to Darjeeling. On Tuesday, there was a breach between Tilucpore and Nawabgunge on the Northern section of the Eastern Bengal Railway above Sara. The breach has now been repaired and trains are running uninterruptedly.

THE 55 years' rule has been extended to the East Indian Railway officers. Another rule has been laid down for all guaranteed and assisted railway companies. Usually, gratuities are grantable to officers on retirement occasioned by sickness, accident, or abolition of appointment. Lower is, however, reserved to reward distinguished service. But an officer who has worked full term and retires on account of age, must not expect any consideration, for he must be presumed to have made sufficient provision for himself and family. That is a good argument against pensions. But is the Government prepared to apply it there?

THE Duke of Connaught has been put in command of the important and extensive Southern Division at Portsmouth. But he is on long leave since the 25th August when he assumed the command, the duty being done by the next senior officer Major-General Geary, R.A.

THE bar is an honorable body and is proud of its noble traditions. The Bombay bar means to uphold the prestige of the profession and highly resents anything that casts the slightest suspicion against any of its members. The Advocate-General, (with three other advocates), on behalf of his brother barristers Kirkpatrick and Anderson applied to the Magistrate and obtained a summons for defamation against one Kanjee Luddah. This man is said to have asked commission on a brief of Lord Colin Campbell. On that noble lawyer refusing, Luddah, it is alleged, said that he had received similar discount from other barristers, naming in especial the prosecutors. This is denied by the gentlemen concerned and is considered derogatory to the profession.

AT the last meeting of the Calcutta Corporation, Baboo Amarendra Nath Chatterjee objected to secret voting on the appointment of Jute Inspector, and finding that the meeting was not disposed to accept his advice, left the hall. The present law leaves it to the Commissioners to decide any question either by show of hand or by ballot. Even when, under the old law, open voting was imperative, the Commissioners would decide, as they do now, personal questions by ballot. They confessed that they had not nerve enough to openly disoblige a friend or act according to conscience, and the legislature, sympathising with their weakness, has left them free to choose their own method of voting.

THE Saturday Herald prosecution has, we are glad, been compounded. The complainant complained that on the occasion of his candidature for the vacant Jute Inspectorship, the Saturday Herald published that, during the inquiry into the abuses of the license department three years ago—an "inquiry which cost more than one inspector his appointment"—Baboo Dharendra Nath Chatterjee (the complainant) who was then an inspector in that department, instead of waiting "for the termination of the inquiry, got rid of his troubles and anxieties by resigning, but now that the matter has been hushed up and almost forgotten, he has been emboldened to seek once more service under the Corporation."

Summonses having been issued against Baboo Sarat Chunder Roy, editor, as the principal defendant, and Baboo Jogendra Chunder Bose, License Inspector, also a candidate for the Jute Inspectorship, as abetter, the parties appeared before the Magistrate to hush their tempest—in a teapot. A letter of apology to the complainant was read in which the editor protests that by all that he had written against Baboo Dharendra Nath Chatterjee he did not intend to suggest anything against his honesty, and if his language is open to such a construction he is sorry for it. The Brahman seems to have been so little prepared for such meekness from the young lion of the Press, that he was dissolved in generosity and not only forgave Baboo Roy but gave Baboo Jogendra Chunder Bose, on his and the editor's declaring that he had had nothing to do with the libel complained of, a certificate of character and his best blessings for the success of his candidature for the post of Jute Inspector to the Corporation—the brazen apple of discord. After these interchanges of politeness, the parties left, more than ever old friends again, not, however, without a speech from the plaintiffs' fraternal counsel. This proved the fly in the ointment. This limb of the law spoiled the Arcadian simplicity and peace of the play with his suggestions of doubt and his dark hints. But he could not spoil the substantial result. And that is a mercy. All's well that ends well, as our good friend deceased used continually to remind the world.

The Brahman's blessing has, of course, come true. Bose has got the Jute Inspectorship.

THE American Senate has passed the Tariff Bill. It admits sugar below the number of 16 standard free and above that number fixes the duty at five-tenths of a cent per pound. Sir John Macdonald, the Canadian Premier, speaking at Halifax, said the Canadians would never be seduced from their allegiance to the British Government by the American tariff. They would find markets elsewhere but never consent to annexation to the United States.

THE Englishman Birchall tried at Woodstock, Canada, for enticing away a young man Benwell, in Canada, and murdering him, has been capitally sentenced. Judicially, Canada is evidently not India.

ON the 29th September, at Naples, Signor Crispi denied to an "interviewer" that the Triple Alliance, lately renewed, operates until 1892. He thought peace was secure unless France broke it. National questions, he said, are giving place to the social question, which will soon dominate the world—till, we suppose, some fine morning the sound of military march and the cannon's opening roar in grim earnest awaken us all to the hard reality

That things are not what they seem, that men are no better than they used to be, that the effect of education is superficial, that civilization has not subdued the national repugnances and antagonisms. Crispi is a long-headed man, but the statesmen of Europe seem to labour under something approaching the delusion which possessed the great Czar Nicholas and, lulling him into a false security, encouraged him in his extravagant pretensions against the Sultan—pretensions which proved so disastrous to all but most to himself. Is it possible that Bismarck is putting them off the scent? Or, is he too aging at length?

AT Trevandrum, lepers are being segregated in the Charity Hospital, where arrangements have been made for housing, dieting and treating the destitute lepers in the town. As a means to this end, private charity to the leper is prohibited. The Travancore Government considers the disease under certain circumstances contagious, and has advised the citizens not to encourage the visits of the leprous to their houses and neighbourhood by giving them alms.

SOME time back a letter appeared in the Englishman praising Mr. Bourdillon, the Collector of Saran, for helping the peasantry with advances for rebuilding their homes washed away in the floods and cultivating their rubbee lands. Another writer in the same paper of Wednesday last, without questioning the praise so far as it is deserved, declares that the area of assistance is limited to the property of the Jatipore Concern. He does not blame Mr. Bourdillon who is prepared to do his best, but the Collector is bound by formalities of law in which valuable time is being wasted. He complains of the Zemindars not coming forward to help their cultivators in this time of need in procuring the assistance of the state. They could not have a better guide than the example of the Jatipore Concern. Its Manager, Mr. Churdon, with equal prudence and benevolence got his tenantry together and made them file proper petitions to the Collectorate containing the necessary particulars of their holdings, &c., which he himself verified. The requirements of the law being satisfied as to the applicant's fitness as an object of help as well as to the sufficiency of the security offered, the Collector made the payments. While, therefore, the tenants of Jatipore have set up their homes again and already commenced field work, those of other estates are dancing attendance at the Collectorate about the necessary preliminaries before they can extract any money for their urgent needs. Meanwhile, as must happen in such crises, many a designing well-to-do man, who is well up in the mysteries of courts and cutcheries, is forking out money for the purpose of buying up the holdings of distressed husbandmen or swindling some luckless moneylender out of his lien. It is impossible for the Collector to discriminate between the deserving and the undeserving applicants, unless loyally assisted by an upright ministerial agency or, above all, a benevolent and active landlordly class. We do hope the appeal to the latter will not go for nothing. But to be of service their response ought to be quick. Every hour is precious.

WE read in a Madras paper that a native hospital assistant was suspended for a year for negligence, insubordination and gross inhumanity. On his expressing unwillingness to rejoin his duties, the assistant has been dismissed from his post and declared incapable of Government service again. Was no other order possible? It is not difficult to understand the rationale of the second punishment, yet, in the absence of details, it seems a needless severity. The human instinct is to sympathise with disinclination to go back to a place which had brought disgrace. How then comes it to be an offence of so deep a dye that nothing short of blasting the man's entire life will meet the case? That does not look like the stern justice of the state but the implacable vindictiveness of an individual official. It may be justice, but it is justice scarcely differentiable from wrong. Such justice at any rate is very far from the rule. And well for the state and its servants that it is not so. In such cases, the practice is rather to show the unsatisfactory servant the door than to keep him confined within. It is no use keeping a man pinned to a post which he has come to abhor. To persecute him as this hospital assistant has been persecuted, is to convert him into a rebel and throw him into the arms of the criminal classes.

The Hilsons, whether in the North or the South, would certainly not like to have their pure justice to others exercised towards themselves.

AT Peddumady Gooda, Hosipooram village, Ganjam, a whole family consisting of father, mother and four children fell ill after dining on cakes made of mango kernels. They were all disturbed in their sleep, and they woke up at midnight complaining of uneasiness, giddiness, pain in the stomach and nausea. The symptoms grew worse and worse till they became unconscious. The youngest child died in the morning and two others the next day. The remaining three were removed by the Police to hospital at Varanasi, where the mother died. On the four deaths, the Coroner's Jury returned a verdict of accidental death caused by eating diseased mango kernels. The Madras Times remarks—"Mango kernels, it is believed, after rain become poisoned by the growth of a kind of fungus in the kernel." Fungus or no fungus, there is enough ground for caution. We believe the dried kernel is used in indigenous Hindu system of medicine as an antidote to animal poison. Therefore, it is scarcely a harmless thing for other use: probably it is a weak poison which taken in heaps—as a staple food, for instance—may prove fatal. The matter is worth careful inquiry. The kernel, both fresh and dry, should be analysed and tried, and then the diseased kernel, with the fungus or otherwise. Meanwhile, native parents had better, to be on the safe side, prevent their children from chewing the soft kernel of which the latter are fond.

HERE is a typical story of individual British grievance against native states. It is nothing particular—the complaint is scarcely worth the paper whereon it is written—nevertheless, from the ready sympathy and support of European society and of the Press, it may be turned to mischievous use. In native territory, the meanest travelling British subaltern thinks himself somebody. The very deference paid to him in politeness or prudence, turns his head the more, and he insists on the most preposterous terms. Travelling at the best is a discomfort, and mountain-climbing is notoriously a feat of difficulty. But such is the fate of India that the very people who, at no small outlay of money or risk to limb and life, are wont to enjoy their miseries and dangers in the Tyrol, not only fret but cry through the papers that their path in the heart of the Himalayas is not smooth as a bowling green and that they are not provided with a first-class hotel at each stage of their journey. A British Prince would be considered impertinent if he criticised the people and the administration of a Swiss Canton under such circumstances and in such a way as our "Sub." speaks of the Ruler of Sukeyt and his subjects in the following:—

"He had much difficulty in coming up, owing to the badness, or rather absence, of roads, and the invisibility of officials, but going back it was worse. He writes:—'I could not even get a man sent on to warn coolies on the second day in Sukeyt territory. I was doing a double march, and rode on myself to warn at a place called Chindi. I found the lumberdar, and whilst he was getting coolies, my dogs unluckily killed a kitten. However, the owner was quite satisfied with eight annas, and had gone into his house, when out rushed another man in an excited state, and abused me, and the English in general, in filthy terms. I took no notice, and just then my leading coolies arrived from Jhungi, and I looked round for the coolies the lumberdar had collected, but could find none of them, so I went into the village and called them.' He goes on to say that, by way of answer, two men rushed at him, knocked off his hat, and hit him in the face, taking him unawares. He 'went' for both of them, and gave one fellow a black eye, keeping them at bay till a Mandi sepoy came to his assistance, and was in his turn assaulted by the villagers. After some minutes' free fight, they quieted down, when out came a Brahman, named Atma, who harangued the villagers, inciting them to stone Lieutenant— and his servants, at the same time, picking up two stones from a heap of building material. Luckily no one followed his advice. Lieutenant's misfortunes culminated at a village 7 miles from Bhaji. The fracas at Chindi had delayed him so much that he was besighted with a badly broken bit of road ahead, so had to make for the nearest village, where he and his servants were refused any shelter, and he had to pass the night in a field. Not a fowl was procurable between Sukeyt and Masnobra. Furniture, I may mention, has been bought for all the rest-houses in Sukeyt, but the Rajah has taken possession of it all, and keeps it locked up in a godown, the rest-houses being bare of everything, and out of repair, that a Dillar on the Sutlej being in danger of tumbling down. As for Dost Sikunder Sen, ruler of this ill-governed, or rather un-governed, State, he seems determined to walk in the evil ways of his deposed predecessor, and the pensioned judicial officer, who is his Wazir, is at times unable to see him for three months at a time."

Our Lieutenant is by no means singular. He is a pretty fair representative of the class of British tourists in the very region in question. Scores of Himalayan travels have been published filled with the same kind of sad stuff—by ladies and gentlemen alike. The passage quoted may excite the derision of those who do not know, but it is with such writing that the manufacture of annexation begins. It is thus that, for instance, Cashmere has come to grief. Travellers and Travellers' Tales were the first dark omen of her destiny. Let Sen beware of Tourists and his Traitor of a Vizier!

He may have the best reason, as he doubtless had every right, to lock up his furniture. But what is the good of allowing them to rot in his godowns? It were more to the purpose to place them at the service of the all-powerful Sahebbugies. Above all, they are Rakshashes for eating who can not bear hunger. Catch the next Lieutenant you find straying into your hill and stuff his stomach with all the wild fowl and tame you can get and fill his mouth, nostrils and ears with eggs so that he may neither hear nor see anything disagreeable and not say anything to your prejudice!

LEPERS are at the present moment special objects of attention. The Prince of Wales has taken them under his Royal protection. The Government of India is urged to provide them with a special law. Attempts are made in several quarters to raise funds for their benefit—that they may have healthy though remote homes to themselves. Several remedies are being tried for cure of the disease. Here is the result of an attempt to purge a leper of his loathsomeness.

"A native recently attempted to cure a leper at Kishargunge, according to public notice, by causing him to be bitten by a deadly cobra. The reptile killed the leper instantly, and the would be curer has been sentenced by the Sessions Judge to five years' imprisonment."

The would-be-curer is punished evidently for culpable homicide not amounting to murder, by administering a deadly poison although without any intention to cause death. If he had succeeded in curing the leper, would he have been punished for doing an act likely to cause death? How many diseased persons are hastened to their last rest by administration of poisonous drugs to bring them back from death's door. Here was an open act after public notice. The leper must have agreed to the treatment preferring the sting of the deadly cobra to his present sufferings. Is it not strange that the act was not prevented, but the actor is punished for his failure?

We are bound to say that the proceeding of the leprosy-doctor was not the wild irrationality that the world takes it to have been. If he employed a deadly poison to cure a difficult disease, he only followed the legitimate practice. A less strong snake of the same deadly species might not have killed outright, and might, by sparing the life of his patient, have saved his credit and his liberty. If he killed by an overdose, the same is done frequently by the practitioners with impunity.

It will be said that if the Faculty deal in powerful poisons, they follow experience, never prescribing them without having previously seen their curative effects. The convicted practitioner, we dare say, did nothing more nor less. Is it to be supposed that he advised the bite of a cobra unless he had seen the good effects of such a bite? That would be not only a most uncharitable but also an unreasonable suggestion. If he had not had such previous experience, but just launched the dangerous experiment on mere hypothesis, he not only deserved his punishment but much more than he has got, though even in such a case he is not so singular as he might seem. Very dangerous experiments are, we fear, indulged in in hospitals by some of the greatest therapeutists, not without fatal results, which are covered by the license of the Faculty and the prestige of the individual. Be that as it may, it is reasonable to suppose that our unfortunate specialist in leprosy had witnessed at least one hopeless sufferer disgusted with life resort to the cobra as a method of suicide or the only chance of cure and get cured instead of dying. For anything that we know conclusively to the contrary, that may be the true remedy. The failure proves nothing perhaps beyond the insufficiency of the convicted man's experience. Had many cases come under his observation he would have known the limitations of the remedy and the safeguards under which it should be administered. We know that, under certain circumstances, people escape with life after the bite of the most venomous reptiles—the deadliest cobras. The serpent that will kill a child will not perhaps kill an adult man or a powerful horse. The same dog wounding several persons almost simultaneously will communicate the rabies to some and not to others. Similarly, the same serpent biting in succession several persons has been known to kill some and simply poison others, while a few have altogether escaped any influence except from nervousness. The obvious reason is that in repeatedly discharging its venom the brute not only drained its stock but also exhausted the capacity of its poison glands.

REIS & RAYYET.

Saturday, October 4, 1890.

THE WEATHER.

LAST week we appeared under unhappy meteorological circumstances. Like the owl for all its feathers of Keats' St. Agnes' Eve, Reis and Rayyet for all its wit and wisdom was a-cold. Not from blasts from the North or dripping snow as in the case of Minerva's pet, but from the moist East wind and the continual downpour from the clouds. The wind was high but fitful, the occasional gusts kept up a threat of violence as if a cyclone was at hand. But the downpour was a downright nuisance precluding business, because preventing all going out. The rain was frightful in its energy and persistency. From time to time it descended for hours in big drops which beat with fierce rage against shutters and panels, deranging the tiled covers in the country, piercing through the thatched roofs of the habitations of the poor. It was a desolating downpour, but not ungrateful to the senses. The air was cool if damp. The punka was at a miserable discount. Those who submitted to it did not care to disturb their man in his sweet doze. The Sanskrit poet Kalidasa has displayed in charming verse the glory of the tropical rains. They are indeed eminently poetical. And they put forth all their fascinations last week. It was charming to see the rhythmic fall in quick regular succession of the endless strings of liquid pearls from Heaven. The music too was fine and varied. Sometimes the ear was assailed as by the sound of the car rattling o'er the stony street. At other times one heard the confused peal of drums in the distance. With more or less force the showers continued with little intermission for the space of a full week. Instead of gradually spending themselves, they waxed stronger as they proceeded, till they reached their climax on Saturday and Sunday. This final effort fairly exhausted them. All through, the sun and moon had been maintaining a struggle with the Fluvian Jove, but the latter had been having the better of them. On Monday, however, the great luminary of day at last found his opportunity and shone in all his glory and the moon followed suit with all her effulgence. And such nights have we had! The sun indeed has been since putting forth all his scorching power, as if to make up for the eclipse to which he had been before condemned. This seems to have riled the Lord Fluvius who shows his sign of impatience with a darkening brow from the distant skies. The war may be renewed any day—or hour.

GOVERNMENT IN NATIVE CENTRAL INDIA.

MR. HENVEY's last report of Central India bristles with interest. Probably he is now the best abused man with the Native Press, nor have we anything to urge one way or the other in regard to his alleged attitude towards that press. His exceedingly well-written and sympathetic and carefully balanced report of the Central India Chiefs, however, places him in an altogether different light. He keeps a strong hand, it is true, on the administration, but there can be no doubt at the same time of his genuine sympathy for the Rulers over whom he is placed. On the contrary, his report shows him to be the best apologist of native rule with even its defects to which he is by no means blind. He has had an experience of Central India of over two years, and he is entitled to speak with authority on the subject. Now let us see what he says. He says "after an experience extending over two years, I am happy to be able to give a fairly encouraging account of the Central India Chiefs, whose faults and failings have been exaggerated." Among a large number, there must be some bad and others indifferent, but "of the main body of them I can say that I have found them generally anxious for the welfare of their subjects, seldom capable of wilfully doing injustice, and often ready to introduce such measures of amelioration as are within their limited means, and are not incompatible with the preservation of their ancient traditions and usages." The point is fully argued by Mr. Henvey, and his observations are characterised by a breadth and statesmanlike grasp to deserve reproduction in extenso. He says:—

"The greatest blot which I perceive is the indebtedness pervading the higher classes of the community. For the peasant, whose rent is taken before his crops are cut, and who has to borrow at exorbitant interest from the village money-lenders, the deepest commiseration must be felt; pity is thrown away on the opium merchant whose difficulties are caused by gambling with time-bargains, but what can be said of the Raja, or Nawab, or Thakur who talks of his honour ('abru') while the Central India Agency is harassed by the importunities of his dunning creditors? Until public sentiment on this subject undergoes a radical change, until it is realised that hopeless insolvency arising from extravagance is an indelible disgrace, compared with which the inability to endow a marriageable daughter is a mere trifle, there is small hope of social regeneration—small hope indeed from sumptuary regulations which no one can enforce. But when all is told, I am not prepared to assert that the general condition of the people of Central India is less happy and comfortable than it is in many districts of British India. Paradoxical as the statement may appear, it has often occurred to me that the average well-being of the lower classes of an Indian community may perhaps be in inverse proportion to the efficiency of the Government. In a country where early marriages are almost a religious duty, and where natural checks on the growth of population have been either removed or mitigated, the tendency is to multiply up to the margin of bare subsistence. On the other hand, in a country already emptied in the so called 'time of trouble' and not re-filled, owing to the want of confidence in the intentions of rulers, each cultivator is a precious possession, and the very paucity of the people, reinforced by threats of emigration, is a substantial guarantee against grinding oppression. It must be admitted that in theory most land in Central India is excessively taxed, and that if the Chiefs were wise they would sacrifice present revenue, in the sure hope of immense returns in the near future, by combining general and immediate reductions of assessment with the offer of liberal terms for bringing waste land into cultivation. But in practice the Central Indian Chief is a very tolerable landlord, and what with laxity of administration, pliability of officials, and recourse to all sorts of shifts, evasions, and concealments, the Central Indian zemindar manages to keep himself up to a decent pitch of ease and prosperity. I cannot otherwise account for the compact and well-stocked villages which I have everywhere seen, for the careful tillage of the soil where circumstances are favourable, and for the rarity of complaints. Disappointed suitors are sometimes heard to say that justice is dead, and that even her daughters, locally known as riyat (influence) and rishwat (bribery) have been solicited in vain. Remonstrances are now and then received from Thakurs and country gentlemen whose privileges are slighted by unsympathetic Mahiattas, and who are thus occasionally converted into most desperate and dangerous marauders. But I never hear of wholesale emigration into British territory, nor of numerous villages deserted and in ruins, nor of anything that betokens despair among the peasantry. Perhaps some parts of Gwalior may be an exception to this rule, but the Gwalior Durbar is patiently endeavouring to apply a remedy by revising demands which, in the declining years of the late Maharaja Jyaji Rao Sindhia, were immoderately raised."

We are thoroughly prepared to accept Mr. Henvey's apparent paradox. The very laxity of Oriental rule often affords compensation for its graver defects.

Mr. Henvey has earned our approbation by his moderate views in other directions. He is no thorough-going reformer after British models, but sees the wisdom of adopting measures to the circumstances with which he has to deal. The settlement operations which are at work in some of the States are condemned by him as out of place in backward Native Territory. Modelled on the British system, they are somewhat too elaborate and costly, and above the level and beyond the working capacity of the local executive agency through which they must eventually be carried into practical effect. He therefore recommends a summary settlement, the main object being "to encourage the Durbar to do their own work, in their own way, as far as possible, with their own indigenous agency, and not to press upon them elaborate reforms which are unsuited to the country and which might not survive the minority of the Chief."

The greatest blot on the administration of these as also of the Rajputana States is the large prevalence of dacoity. Mr. Henvey is far from slurring over this dark side of his picture. His report is thoroughly manly and straightforward and more than ever free from the usual characteristic of official reports of being overlaid with the colour of the rose. In speaking of education, for instance, he says roundly "the darkness is Cimmerian." For the prevalence of crime, he assumes the full responsibility and offers the following practical explanation:—

"But if any one will take the trouble to examine a large map of Central India, and mark how jurisdictions are intermixed, he will be surprised, not that dacoities are frequently committed by small gangs of professional criminals, uncivilized Bhils, Wilayati desperadoes, and discontented Rajputs, but that peace and security are at all possible amid the conflict of authorities and in conditions which are so favourable to the escape of offenders....."

"I have never missed an opportunity of impressing upon the States and especially upon Gwalior, my conviction that much of the worst and most dangerous form of dacoity is due to agrarian disputes, to the maltreatment of proud and impoverished Rajputs, and to disregard for the privileges and sensibilities of the natural leaders of the people. I have urged that this evil cannot be cured by repression alone; that repression must go hand in hand with conciliation, and that it might even be worth while to convert marauders into protectors of the tracts in which they have influence by the grant of lands on favourable terms or of liberal allowances."

There is no doubt that the intermixture of jurisdictions is largely responsible for these discreditable state of things, but there is no help for it excepting, as Mr. Henvey wisely says, in advising and urging the Durbars to co-operate, instead of mutually obstructing. Mere rules and regulations will be no panacea as is often imagined. Mr. Henvey therefore looks in the first instance to the good sense of the Chiefs themselves, failing which he will have no choice but to adopt measures which cannot be palatable. He says "the Chiefs are well aware that if, by reason of indifference and obstruction, crime should become intolerably rife, the alternative of organising an international police under British supervision is within the region of practical politics." At present, however, his warnings are having effect, and we trust the threatened encroachment upon the liberties of the Chiefs may not actually take place.

ACTIVITY IN INDIGENOUS LITERATURE.

THE extraordinary expansion of the press in India in our times could not well go without its special evils. For one thing, we are deluged with a mass of publications, a very few good or passable, but most of them absolutely bad. A legion of chevaliers of industry has sprung up who are authors in despite of Nature and Art. You are confronted by publicists who cannot parse and poets innocent of prosody. You are attacked by philosophers by dozens and politicians by scores. The activity of the Native Press, in both the vernacular and Sanskrit departments, is out of all proportion to its capacity, giving a handful of wheat to a bushel of chaff. There are not only pretenders in the field but also swindlers in plenty, and between them they are plying a brisk trade to the injury of true letters.

We see no prospect of abatement of the nuisance except in destruction from its own plethora. The vernacular newspaper press is often but its newspaper organ. The native English press is not always in the best hands and is easily induced to lend its alliance to the evil cause. Even the European journals in India themselves, in their weakness as well as their ignorance, are ready to play into the hands of unprincipled puffers.

For our own humble part, we endeavour to do our duty with discrimination and as much firmness as may become poor Bengali human nature. If we have not the heart to condemn, we show by neglect our left-handed appreciation. And this is our treatment of most of the publications that reach us. From time to time, we take up a book or tract for dissection, by way of a pointed warning, and in order to teach aspirants to authorship what is expected of them. For the most part, silence is kind and wise—for all interests. For trash may thrive under punishment, as certain races multiply in squalor and wretchedness. Condemnation is a constructive commendation.

Among so many provoking intruders, it is a delightful relief to meet with an occasional arrival of a different class. Such a welcome visitor is Pandit Avinas Chandra Kaviratna. He comes armed with credentials. He has occupied a special department—indigenous medical literature, but he is no usurper. He is neither a swindler nor an ignoramus. A Brahman by birth, he is a Pandit by education and a physician by profession. From almost the commencement of his start in life, now a good many years, he has devoted himself to the diffusion of the great works in medicine and surgery in Sanskrit and to the professional enlightenment of his fellow-practitioners of indigenous medicine. Although he does not give away his books and pamphlets gratuitously, he is scarcely less a literary philanthropist than the famous publisher of the Mahabharat. Without any grants from Governments or Princes, he has produced with wonderful despatch an astonishing mass of literature in a difficult department. He issues a Bengali medical magazine on a novel plan, embracing all the systems of cure known in this country. He supplies the indigenous branch, while the European methods are represented by some of the ablest Bengali medical men, of the allopathic and homœopathic schools. No better agency could be devised for improving what may be called the class of hedge-doctors. This work singly, in which he has been engaged for years, with the munificent aid of a single family once in the foremost rank for liberality, entitles the Pandit to our gratitude. The nation, as John Bright reminded us all, lives in the cottage, and surely the improver of the medical practice for the multitudinous masses of Bengal is not a common benefactor. In his more ambitious work, which is no less striking in volume or interest, he has been all alone, either in a literary or a pecuniary way. The names of his several publications would fill a page and their aggregate letter-press a small book-case. He first brought himself to notice by his edition of the great work of Charaka, the Galen of Hindu Medicine, in two bulky volumes of 1,500 pages. By this the whole body of native practitioners and the learned throughout the world were for the first time placed in possession of the whole text of the most valuable relic of old Hindu science, long sought for but never found. The Pandit has enhanced its value by giving a translation in Bengali. This translation is a free one, on purpose. It is impossible to understand these ancient works without the constant guidance of scholia and commentaries. It would have swelled the proportions of his undertaking to add the commentaries. Nor would such addition have brought Charaka any nearer the business and bosoms of most Bengalis, whether learned or unlearned. Author and commentators, in original and in translation, were too much to expect, and would have been too much of a good thing. Pandit Avinas Chandra adopted the golden mean by issuing his author only, with a translation embodying the explanations and amplifications of the commentators. He has thus achieved the maximum of usefulness with the minimum of cost or waste. He next took up Susruta, the leading work in ancient Hindu Surgery. This has been several times attacked with more or less success. An imperfect text, long since out of print, was brought out at great cost for the old Council of Education, in 2 vols., half a century ago. Some thirty years ago, a translation in Latin was published in Germany, but without any text. In India, of late years, at different places, a few fasciculi have been issued, with or without gloss or translation, but completion has not been attained in any case that we know. This Pandit's design goes farther. He is publishing by parts Susruta Samhita in original with the famous commentary of Dallanacharya. The authority of these works is not confined to Bengal, but extends throughout the Continent of India. In order to bring knowledge to all parts of the Empire, he is printing Susruta in Devanagari character which is understood over a wider area, and is translating his author not only in Bengali but also in Hindi, the lingua franca of all Northern India. He has already issued many parts of the several series. He is a man of wonderful elasticity. While proceeding with his various engagements, and specially with his arduous Hindi Susruta and Charaka Samhita with the scholium of Dallan Acharya, he has taken up a suggestion thrown out by Dr. Max Muller, and has issued proposals for publishing an English version of Charaka. In fact, we have before us the first fasciculus. The specimen of translation of the opening chapter seems well done, and is enriched with notes by the translator. It is preceded by an able introduction. Such a man would be a rare worker in any land. Surely, in this land of Lotos he is a treasure. He is engaged in a Herculean Undertaking, but he is full of confidence, and we have no doubt that, with the legitimate support of the public, he will bring it into honourable completion.

Another worker, though in a different field of literature, but of equal energy and perseverance, is another Brahman, Baboo Ram Gopal Sanyal. There is little in common between the labours of the two, yet it may be said that Sanyal is doing for contemporary biography and annals something of the service that Kaviratna is doing for ancient Hindu medicine. Let no body smile at our remark. The facts of the day may be as hopelessly buried as any long-past transactions. They therefore do a distinct service to us and posterity who take pains to record for all time the interesting matters and personalities of the passing hour. No matter, if the recorder is not a brilliant penman. It is enough that he has eyes to see and ears to hear. The brilliant moulder and manipulator—not always a safe man!—will appear in due course. But without the humble labours of the pioneer, all the genius of hereafter will avail not. Babu Sanyal has for some years occupied the field of the preliminary witness. He first published a Life of Kristodas Pal in English, and then a Life of Hurris Chunder Mookerjee in Bengali. He next issued a collection of the most notable state papers, Government Resolutions, &c., relating to individual grievances which stirred the sympathies of the people during the last few years. He has now brought out a Bengali Life of Kristodas Pal. This is no translation of his book in English but an entirely new work, which will interest those who have read the previous memoir. It is not still without inaccuracies, but some new information has been added.

THE SILLY SEASON.

If the excessive rains of last week caused a "silly season" (see our opening paragraph of "News" &c.) the extraordinary following heat during this week has continued it. Wednesday's Englishman contains an important letter on the India Government's reply to the Chamber of Commerce's representation on the Income Tax. "Civis"—as the Correspondent signs himself—writes well and forcibly, but his letter is disfigured by a terrible blunder. Referring to the abolition of the Tax, by Lord Northbrook, after an exhaustive inquiry which established that it was partially oppressive and wholly demoralising, and to the solemn promise then made that it should never be reimposed, the writer says—

"Now I fail to see why the present Government is not as much bound by this promise as it professes to be by Lord Dalhousie's engagement to the terms of the Permanent Settlement."

To what "profession" of the "present Government" does "Civis" allude, as not in harmony with its contempt for the promise of the Northbrook administration on the subject of the Income Tax? There is not a word about the Permanent Settlement in Mr. Secretary Sinker's despatch to the Chamber. A passage quoted in paragraph 3 from Sir Auckland Colvin's speech contains part of a sentence evidently leading to the immunity from general taxation enjoyed by holders of landed property under the Settlement. But the latter part of the sentence in question has been carefully expunged and the excision marked by three asterisks. We have no time to refer to the original source for the full speech, but surely so well-informed a Civilian as Sir Auckland Colvin, who had besides been one of the ablest Settlement officers in the N. W. Provinces, did not father the Permanent Settlement on Lord Dalhousie. We do not even think that "Civis" himself consciously committed the mistake. If the name occurs in his MS. it was a mere slip of the pen. Such slips are common in contributions received at every newspaper office—communications scrawled in haste and dropped into the post office without careful perusal by the writers. It is the office of the editors to correct them as they correct the grammar. The neglect or inability to remove the single flaw in "Civis" gives an able letter an air of "griffinage," which detracts from its just weight and gives the official class an easy opportunity for a gratuitous laugh at the expense of "these mercantile scribes."

"Civis" complains of the manner no less than the matter of the Government missile at the head of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce. He says:—

"I hardly think the Indian Newspaper Press has sufficiently represented the sense of indignant surprise and disappointment produced in the public mind by the recent reply of the Government of India to the Chamber of Commerce in relation to the Income-tax. Seldom has a State paper been drawn up in so high-handed a fashion. Instead of welcoming an expression of public feeling and opinion on an important subject, the Government adopts an attitude of lofty rebuke, practically informing its correspondents that they are meddling in matters too high for them, and that it can govern the country without their help. The remarkable sentence in which it states that it will remove (and I presume impose) taxation when it sees fit and proper to do so, without any need for action or suggestion on the part of public bodies (or words to that effect) is as ill-imagined as it is ill-advised. What constitutional Government has ever thus claimed to act without reference to public opinion, and has not rather made public opinion the fitting guide of its action? When Mr. Lowe (as he was then) withdrew his proposed tax on lucifer matches, what but a strong adverse expression of public opinion, and that of one class, caused that withdrawal? This surprising document is devised in a thoroughly bureaucratic spirit, and the loss of 'touch' that it reveals between the Government and the people, forms a strong additional indictment against the practice of the great Government of a great country shutting itself up for the best part [part] of the year in a distant mountain solitude, where it 'lies beside its nectar,' and where the suggestions or complaints of an 'ill-used' Chamber of Commerce seem to it but 'like a tale of little meaning, though the words are strong.'"

A common misprint like "past" for "part" were scarcely worth notice but that our contemporary had a keen eye for the notes that disfigured the optics of his neighbours.

The special editorial department of the leading journal is no more free from reproach. It is the same on Wednesday as on Monday. In the same issue of the 1st instant the leading article, after speaking of the Hindus, refers to the "Mulwaris." We never saw the word before. We cannot be sure about hearing till we know the pronunciation. It is always a puzzle to the world to determine the sound of the Oriental words and proper names occurring in the Englishman. Although our contemporary is afflicted with the Hunterian malady, the writers on the journal are many of them free and the rest discover but a faint touch. Nor is there sufficient scholarship on the establishment to exhibit a uniformity of spelling in the paper. According to the Hunterian transliteration which the Englishman professes, "Mulwari" is in plain English Moolwari or rather Moolworee. We know no such thing. Indeed, Moolwori or Mulwari or Malwari, it is all the same to us—a mystery. Nor, for this matter, is anybody else wiser than our humble Indian self. Our contemporary has made a notable ethnological or anthropologic discovery. An Indian sect or tribe under one or another of the names and different to the Hindus is a new contribution to knowledge. Is it possible that the writer refers to the Mār-wāris? Then, it is an offence to speak of them as a non-Hindu people.

So many shortcomings, typographical and literary, within a fraction of a single day's broadsheet, seem to show that there is something rotten in the state of Denmark. We need not pursue the ungracious task any more. We will only end with a crowning brace of blunders. Our contemporary gives an account of the "College of Pandits at Nadiya." The opening sentence is startling. We are told—

"Nadiya is the chief seat of Sanskrit learning in Bengal, and from its essentially religious character has been called the Oxford of Bengal."

Is Oxford such a religious centre? Whatever it may have been in the long past, since the rise of the Tractarian movement it has been the house of heresy. Latterly, the acute eye of Mons. Taine detected the reigning proclivity to Mill and Comte. Never, perhaps, in this century was it a place distinguished for "its essentially religious character." One would suppose from the Englishman that Oxford was the British Mecca or Benares. After several paragraphs of an account which seems to be native work, by one who knows, our contemporary mentions the Report of the College and remarks that it is published in English. We have not seen it. Perhaps, it is a continuation of the lingual policy to exclude the Report from the observation of native journalists even though publishing in English. Our contemporary reserves his greatest surprize for his final paragraph. In this, he informs the world

"Sir Warren Hastings was the only English Governor-General who succeeded in winning the hearts of the Pandits."

Unfortunately, the world is ignorant of that glorious baronet or knight.

MOORSHEDABAD.

Moorsheadabad, 28th September 1890.

The criminal cases which arose out of the unfortunate disturbance on the occasion of the last Mohurram here, details of which have already appeared in your columns, have at last been heard and disposed of by the District Magistrate Mr. Luson, to whose file they were transferred by the Sub-divisional Officer of Lalbagh owing to the latter's unwillingness to try them himself, he being an eye witness to the occurrence. The most prominent members of the Berhampore bar were engaged on both sides. The depositions of the Deputy Magistrate, the District Superintendent of Police and the European Police Inspector of this city were taken. They all confirmed to a word the statements made by me in my previous letters. The Sunnis have been found guilty of being the aggressors and punished with fines. Not a single charge could be brought home to the Shias and they have therefore been acquitted. The case of pronouncing the Taburrah thereby wounding the religious feelings of the Sunnis has been withdrawn. It is hoped that no mishap will in future take place in the performance of the Mohurram ceremonies. The Mahomedan Sub-Inspector of Police has been transferred. The ensuing chebelum or the obsequial ceremony on the 40th day which comes off shortly will, it is proposed, be celebrated under Hindu police escort under the personal superintendence of the District Magistrate and the District Superintendent of Police.

I cannot help regretting the evil outcome of this troublesome occurrence. It appears that while the enraged feeling of one party is gradually and quietly settling down to its normal state, that of the other still continues in full swing and threatens to take a permanent shape. A Sunni defence association has, I hear, been formed and established at Berhampore under the presidency of Raja Zillur Rahman Khan, Zemindar of Talibpor, in this district, with the object, among others, of stopping once for all the reading of the Taburrah. It is monstrous to think, in these days of British rule and religious toleration, of one sect trying to preach crusade against another. Instead therefore of wasting their money and energy in such trifling sectarian disputes, it were wiser for the promoters of the association to devote their resources to the improvement of educational and political status wherein the Mahomedans unfortunately still lag behind their infidel fellow-countrymen. Printed prospectuses and appeals for funds are, I hear, in course of circulation throughout the length and breadth of India.

The Nawab Bahadur of Moorsheadabad, G. C. I. E., whose early recovery from his dangerous illness had been eagerly looked for by the inhabitants of this district, has recently placed himself under the Yunani system of treatment, having already had enough of the European ones. A Hakim has been brought down from Lucknow on a monthly salary of Rs. 500, exclusive of board and lodging. We hope the Great Dispenser of all good will grant the Nawab Bahadur speedy restoration to health and spirits. It was not long ago that His Highness contributed Rs. 1,000 towards the relief of the sufferers from the late floods and ordered the postponement of collection of rents from the tenants of his Sambhulpur mahal. While sorely ailing, he commemorated the joyful occasion of his promotion to the G. C. I. E. ship by awarding handsome and liberal increase to the pay of his Minister, and his English and Persian Secretaries and by the distribution of alms to the poor. One omission though there was, it was naturally due to his extreme mental dejection caused by his prolonged illness that his poorer officers and menials were excluded from a share of his favor. As His Highness takes a great interest in their welfare, hopes may yet be entertained that when he comes round he will surely extend his bounty towards them and thereby earn their lasting gratitude and regard.

After a week's foul weather we have been blessed with a day of brilliant sunshine. For days it rained cats and dogs with scarcely any intermission. The river has again risen. Low land crops have already been totally destroyed by inundation. People therefore looked upon the high land crops as the only means of saving themselves from the impending famine. But unfortunately for them these are reported to have rotted by last week's rain. Articles of food have become dear and at places unavailable. Such is the miserable condition of this part of the country. Let us see what steps the Government will adopt to mitigate the sufferings of the people.

I have to record with extreme pain and regret the untimely death of our wellknown townsman Moulvi Syud Mobaruck Ali.

which took place in Calcutta last week. A son of the late esteemed Nawab Jafer Ali Khan, the deceased was a member of the Sub-executive Service and had served in the districts of Midnapur, Burdwan, Bhagulpore and the Sonthal Pergunnah. He was stricken with hemiplegia last year and after long and careful treatment partially recovered from the attack. He went to Calcutta lately for a short change and there was a relapse to which he succumbed. He leaves behind a son and a brother to whom I offer my sincere condolence and sympathy.

The Congress High Priest the Hon'ble Pandit Ajodhya Nath came here a few days ago and delivered a series of lectures at Berhampore and Azimganj. He came with the object of collecting subscriptions for the Indian Political Agency in London. His mission has been to some extent successful.

The second triennial term of the local self-government of this city is approaching its close. Speculations are rife as to the constitution of the future Municipal Council and the selection of its Chairman. It is proposed in some quarters to have a Mahomedan unofficial chairman next time. The trial of a Hindu (the present incumbent being Kumar Ranajit Sinha of the Nashipur Raj) has proved successful. Some are of opinion that the Kumar should be reelected, while others are for an official chairman. It would, however, be a pity if the old capital of Bengal be found unworthy of managing its own affairs by its own people without the help of an official magnate. If the electors are strong enough against pressure from interested circles and return good representatives, there is no fear of being trodden under official sole.

SULTAN ABDUL HAMID.

(From the New Review.)

For more than a hundred years the spirit of our Western civilization has knocked at the door of the Moslem world in Asia without being able to show any striking result, or a result which can be called adequate to the efforts made. The reasons of this comparative failure are manifold and have been frequently discussed; but there is, nevertheless, one main cause which has not been duly considered. This is the relation between the people and their princes in Mahomedan Asia, a relation which is quite peculiar; for free and independent public opinion does not exist in Asiatic society, and the masses, accustomed to follow blindly their leaders, accept only the innovations and reforms of which their rulers or ruling classes have furnished an example. Hence the axiom: Look at the prince and you will know his people; and hence the undeniable fact that all the changes effected by our Western culture upon the various peoples in Mahomedan Asia are nothing but the reflex of those produced on the individuality of the respective princes.

In the list of the said princes Sultan Abdul Hamid occupies the foremost place, inasmuch as Turkey can justly be described as the Mahomedan country most advanced on the path of modern civilisation; a circumstance mainly due to the efforts of the present Sultan. It is about thirty-one years since, whilst living in the house of the late Rifaat Pasha in Constantinople, that I was called upon one day to give the first rudimentary lessons in French to Fatma Sultan, a daughter of Abdul Majid, and the wife of Ali Ghalib Pasha, living at that time in a yali (summer residence) on the European side of the Bosphorus. The way in which I imparted the first notions of that foreign tongue to the Imperial lady was certainly a peculiar one. My pupil was seated behind a curtain in the harem; in fact, I never saw her face, and having been ushered into a room belonging to the Mabeyin (the intervening portion between the harem and selamlık) I strove to do my best to fulfil my duty by reading a sentence or two in Turkish translated into French, which I heard repeated by a soft feminine voice behind the curtain. It was while engaged in this somewhat strange mode of teaching that I made the acquaintance of a young prince, about sixteen years old, called Hamid Effendi, who, on a visit to the house of his favourite sister used to attend my lessons, and with his pure Oriental face and expressive eyes had attracted my attention. I hardly spoke to him, for it is against Oriental etiquette to address a prince, but his countenance and his reserved and dignified manners left an indelible trace on my memory.

Nearly thirty years had passed when, after a long absence from the East, I again visited the Turkish capital. Great changes had taken place in the Ottoman Empire, as well as in my own life. We both had grown older, and when the present ruler of the valiant, but sadly misunderstood, Turkish people expressed the desire to make the personal acquaintance of the European who had devoted his whole life to the language, history and ethnology of the Turkish race, I was not at all surprised that the shrewd prince did not recognise at once the quondam Topal Khdja i. e., lame teacher as I was usually called, a short recapitulation of by-gone events, however, sufficed to revive dimmed memory. I had a long and interesting conversation with Sultan Abdul Hamid, whose career I had attentively followed, and I can thus say something about the personal character of that greatest and most influential amongst Mahomedan rulers, a prince who in the future is destined to play a delicate and important part in the history of our times and who is,

I am sorry to say, so often misunderstood by the public in general as well as by the political world.

Sultan Abdul Hamid Khan, now in his forty-eighth year, unites in his character the leading features of his grand-father, Sultan Mahmud, and of his father Sultan Abdul Majid. From the former he has inherited unbounded zeal and activity; and from the latter a rare degree of affability and kindness of heart. I do not exaggerate in stating that history can hardly show an Oriental prince so distinguished by untiring love of work and untiring energy as the present Sultan of Turkey. From early morning till late at night he is engaged in state affairs; and he not only examines every important matter, but occupies himself also with minor details, and pays attention to petty questions, to the detriment of his health and the course of government. I found him one day on his canapé, having at his right a large pile of Turkish newspapers together with translations from the foreign Press; and on his left several bundles of state papers submitted for his perusal and ultimate decision. Whilst talking to me he continually glanced to right and left, betraying an anxiety to go through his papers, and I became fully convinced of the truth of what I heard from Sureya Pasha, his first secretary, that he had never put his signature to a paper he had not read and considered carefully. Of course, with such a painstaking and searching ruler, the power of the Ministers is very limited, and the present statesmen of Turkey have naturally dwindled down to weak and helpless officials. This is certainly the reverse of the medal, but it must not be ascribed entirely to suspicion and want of confidence, as is generally assumed in the diplomatic circles of Pera and in the leading circles of Europe. A prince who witnessed the dethronement of two of his predecessors; who, by his shrewdness and sagacity, has carefully studied the intrigues of the Palace and of the Eastern official world; who knows that in his foreign relations everybody is against him and nobody for him—such a prince it is hardly fair to reproach with excessive caution and scrupulousness, or to ask to submit implicitly and unconditionally to his surroundings. As one of the few Europeans whom the Sultan has favoured with his confidence, I have been often asked whether his experience and information are equal to his activity, and whether he does not over-rate his capabilities. Well, candidly speaking, I must say that the education of Sultan Abdul Hamid, like that of all Oriental princes, was defective, very defective indeed; but an iron will, great judgment, and rare acuteness have made good this shortcoming, and now he not only knows the multifarious relations and intricacies of his own much-tried Empire, but is thoroughly conversant with European politics, and I am not going too far in stating that it has been solely the moderation and self-restraint of Sultan Abdul Hamid which has saved us hitherto from a general European conflagration. During the late Bulgarian troubles he was asked by Russia and by the central European Powers to validate his rights in Eastern Roumelia by an armed intervention; but keeping in view the adage, Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes, he answered with the Arab saying: "Peace is the best of all judges," and acquiesced in one of the most crying acts of injustice rather than appeal to arms.

As to his personal character, I have found the present ruler of the Ottoman Empire of great politeness, amiability, and extreme gentleness. Always anxious to disarm his declared enemies by civilities, he is particularly grateful to those who have been attached to him for a long time, and as to his politeness towards European ladies visiting his court, he fully deserves the title of the Ré-galant noma of the East. When sitting opposite him during my private interviews, I could not avoid being struck by his extremely modest attitude, by his quiet manners, and by the bashful look of his eyes. He carefully avoids in conversation all allusion to his position as a ruler, and when unavoidably obliged to mention the beginning of his reign, he invariably says, "since I came to this place-----." Whether his behaviour be the outcome of his personal character, or the result of his conviction of the changes produced by the democratic tendencies of our age, even in the East, we need not inquire. Suffice it to say that Sultan Abdul Hamid is the very personification of a roi bourgeois, who is anxious to do away with all the encumbering etiquette of Oriental court life, and who likes to show himself plain, civil and unaffected to his visitors. Even to scenes of Oriental pageantry, inseparable from Royalty in the East, he has imparted more than one feature of modern European court life. He drives himself at the official parades, his dress is scrupulously plain, he has discarded the aigrette worn on the fez by his predecessors as a sign of Royalty, and it is only at the Imperial state dinners that luxury, but not greater than that usual at Western courts, is exhibited. The highly-finished plate is of pure gold and silver, the ornaments are rare masterpieces of jewellery, the dishes of exquisite French cookery, and although every guest has before him several glasses, it is only the non-Mahomedan to whom the servants serve wine. The Sultan and his Mahomedan guests drink only water. On such occasions the Sultan, often having at his right and left European ladies, shows particular politeness and amiability, for in the art of conquering his guests by signs of particular favour, Abdul Hamid is really incomparable. On one occasion I was presented with a dish of strawberries, laid out in various lines according to the different shadings of the fruit, headed by a bit of paper bearing the inscription, "From the plants reared by the hand of his Majesty." On another occasion the servant brought me an apple and a peach of extraordinary beauty, and I had a gracious word from the Sultan, whilst during my last invitation to his table I was greatly struck to hear Hungarian national music played by the Imperial band in the adjoining saloon, and on looking round a servant accosted me with a message from His Majesty that the Hungarian airs had been studied by the band by special order for that evening.

As a ruler I found Sultan Abdul Hamid quite an exception to his chers frères in the East, and in some respects in advance of some of our European princes. A monarch who sits down with his Minister of Finance, ready to spend several hours in revising accounts, in devising new measures, and in examining most scrupulously minute details, is certainly a rarity. "We are all tired and exhausted," said one of the ministers to me, "but the Sultan never is, and if he yields to our entreaties it is only for our sakes and not for his own." There are from five to ten chamberlains and officers passing continually between his private rooms and the office of his first Secretary Sureya Pasha, who has to send in, viz., to present, every private letter and every document arriving at the palace. The Sultan, owing to his extraordinary memory recollects events long ago forgotten by his Ministers. The past of ten or fifteen years is as fresh in his mind as if it were but yesterday; and in spite of the twenty-one years which have elapsed since his visit to Europe, he still remembers vividly the streets, public places, and buildings of the chief towns, as well as the dresses and features of the persons he met, with an accuracy which is really astounding. Good memory is for the rest peculiar to gifted Asiatics but the characteristic which distinguishes Sultan Abdul Hamid from other Eastern princes is decidedly the modern tone of his views on religion, politics and education. A firm believer in the tenets of his religion, he likes to assemble round him the foremost Mollahs and pious Sheiks, upon whom he profusely bestows Imperial favors; but he does not forget to send from time to time presents to the Greek and American patriarchates, and nothing is more ludicrous than to hear this prince accused by a certain class of politicians in Europe of being a fanatic and an enemy to Christians: a prince who by appointing a Christian for his chief medical attendant; and a Christian for his Minister of Finance (I mean Mavrogeni and Agob Pashas) did not hesitate to entrust most important duties to non-Mahomedans. As a further proof of his toleration we may refer to the fact that Sultan Abdul Hamid is the first Ottoman ruler in whose hospitality not only European princes and ambassadors and distinguished visitors from the West, but his own Christian subjects, amply partake. He is the first Ottoman ruler who has publicly encouraged the art of painting and of sculpture, in spite of those arts being strictly forbidden by orthodox Mahomedanism, and during one of my visits he pointed with a certain pride to two pictures in his saloon as having been painted by Moslem pupils brought up in the School of Art at Stamboul. These two pictures represent Soyud, the place in Asia Minor where the Ottoman Empire was founded and the mausoleum of its first ruler, namely Sultan Osman. As another instance of the Sultan's liberal views I may mention the foundation of a museum, where statues illustrating the Greek mythology are exhibited, statues held in horror by pious Mahomedans, and to look at which even is a deadly sin according to the precepts of the Koran.
